CHAPTER THIRTEEN

"That would be ingenious. I'll see what can be done." Kenway dutifully made a note, after which he paused staring at his pencil. "If that was when Borden was shot," he said presently, "it's rather a point in Hemersley's favour. Andrews was in the street already when the backfiring began and passed Darnley Mansions almost immediately. I was particular on that point with him, but I'll see him again. According to what he has already said I don't think Hemersley could have killed Borden and got down to the entrance between the beginning of the explosions and the time Andrews saw him."
"You can check that. But you've got away from what you were telling me."
"Oh, yes; about the Boldovina. Of course, people are coming and going all the time there and no special notice is taken unless they draw attention to themselves. Some did last night. There was the couple Borden quarrelled with. The waiter says they came in about 10—there is dancing and a cabaret, you know—there was a second lady with them but she was dancing when the row started. After the fuss the women went into the ladies' cloak-room; it happened to be empty at the time and the attendant remembers them. The one Borden had spoken to was upset and the other sent the attendant for brandy. When she brought it the lady took a sip; then she and her friend got their wraps and went out. The friend came back alone in a few minutes."
"What happened to the other?"
"She and the man went away in a taxi. That's from the commissionaire who had already called the cab on the gentleman's orders."
"You told me most of this when I saw you this morning. At that time you thought it might have been this man that Andrews saw at Darnley Mansions and the woman who was in the flat."
"Hemersley has wiped that out by admitting it was himself Andrews saw. He also told me who they are—a Mr. and Mrs. Winterton, friends of his from Stratfordham. Besides, according to him, Winterton had no possible motive for wanting to kill Borden." He briefly outlined the cause of the quarrel in the restaurant as Roy had related it to him.

"That may be all right," said the superintendent; "but you had better not forget that the trouble began between Borden and the lady."
"I have that noted but, for the moment, I don't think I need bother with them. It seems more important that after they left, the lady who had been with them returned to the cloak-room. The attendant was glad to see her back because she hadn't been paid for the brandy she had bought. She didn't ask for it at once because the lady got busy with her powder puff and lipstick and the woman didn't want to seem over-anxious. She was doing something on her own account and next time she looked round the lady was gone and another one had come into the room."
"Does she matter?"
"She may. I got the woman to describe her on the off chance and unless I'm all wrong, she was Miss Avice Carlake, the tenant of Number 10, Darnley Mansions, next door to Borden's flat. She collected her wraps and went."
"Where?"
"No information. Her story when I questioned her last night, was that she and Anthony Revelstone, one of the men who was with her when I got to the Mansions, arrived there about 1.30 a. m., saw nothing wrong, and went into her flat, where they were joined later on by Samuel Lander, who was blind to the world."
"I remember them in your first report. They were with Borden at the Boldovina."
"Yes, and she and Revelstone gave me to understand that they had stopped there expecting him to come back. But nobody on the staff remembers seeing her after eleven. She may have been unnoticed, of course; but why did she take her gear from the cloakroom so early if she wasn't leaving? I shall have to see her again about that."
"You will?"
"But I'm really more interested in the other one—Mrs. Winterton's friend. A young gentleman came knocking at the door of the ladies' room and asked the attendant if she was still there. He didn't mention names, but described her so that the woman had no doubt who he was after. Both the girls had gone by then, but the woman did not tell him that—I fancy it pays to keep a still tongue in her job. She put him off—easy enough—and promised to give a message. She described the gentleman—Hemersley again!—and I conclude it was after that he took a stroll to Darnley Mansions. Looks as he knew something."

HAMPTON W. I.

The July meeting of the Hampton W. I. was held at the home of Mrs. Donald Cameron with 14 members and 2 visitors present. The meeting opened with the "Creed" in unison, followed by the reading of the minutes by Mrs. Edwin Ferguson, secretary pro tem, which were approved and signed. Roll call was answered by giving a card or 10 cents.
A letter was read from Dr. Lantz promising to assist in getting a doctor for Hampton, also a letter from Dental Clinic, wanting to know which children are to go to Craupad this year. A letter was read from Mrs. T. Best thanking Hampton for the part taken in the Library Contest and crediting the W. I. with $26.81.
Sick committee reported nobody sick and sent $1.00 to a new baby.
New committees were appointed as follows: Sick, Ruth MacQuarrie and Georgie Villett; program, Faye Cameron and Sadie Ferguson, and lunch, Ruth MacQuarrie, Doris Myers and Donna Sherren.
It was decided to ask the president of the Hall to advertise a meeting, all interested to attend. Next place of meeting will be the home of Mrs. William Myers, with roll to be answered with a 25 cent donation for a grab bag. Mrs. G. Cannon and Mrs. Don Cameron gave a short verbal report from the Charlottetown Convention, and the collection was taken amounting to $1.05.
Before the letters SOS were adopted generally as a distress signal at sea, the letters CDQ were used.

with his nose than in any other way.
"Don't do that!" called a sharp voice.
Little Too-Smart looked up. There on a tree was the same red-coated little stranger he had seen and heard when Prickly Porky had first appeared. It was Chatterer the Red Squirrel.
"Don't do what?" asked Little Too-Smart.
"Don't touch those things!" cried Chatterer.
"Why not? They can't hurt me," replied Little Too-Smart, and put his nose down to smell of those little sticks. He touched the point of one, then he lifted his head quickly. In doing it his nose brushed against two or three others. When he lifted his head, three of them were clinging to his little black nose, and they hurt.
"What did I tell you?" shrieked Chatterer. "Now you'll have a sore nose."
It was sore already. Those were Prickly Porky's spears, his little quills.
