THE PIRATE.

By Sir Walter Scott.
CHAPTER XXIV.

But here Swertha reminded the Ranzelman that he must go down to the haven to get off the fishing-boats; "For both that my heart is sair for the bonny lad, and that I am fear'd he cast up of his ain accord before you are at sea; and, as I have often told ye, my master may lead, but he wima drive; and if ye do not do his bidding, and get out to sea, the never a bottle of boar hie will ye see."

"Weel, good dame," said the Ranzelman, "we will lanch as fast as we can; and by good luck, neither Clawson's boat, nor Peter Gro's is out to the hiaaf this morning, for a rabbit ran across the path as they were going on board, and they came back like wise men, kenning they had be called to their work this day. And a marvel it is to think, Swertha, how few real judicious men are left in this land. There is our great Udaler is weel enough when he is fresh, but he makes over many voyages in his ship and his yawl to be lang; and now, they say, his daughter, Mistress Minna, is sair out of sorts. Then there is Norma kenna muckle mar than other folk, but wise woman ye cannot call her. Our tacksman here, Maister Mertoun, his wit is sprung in the bowerpit, I doubt—his son is a daff gowk; and I ken a few of consequence hereabouts—excepting always myself, and maybe you, Swertha—but what may, in some sense or other, be called fools."

"That may be, Niel Ranzelsson," said the dame; "but if you do not hasten the faster to the shore, you will lose tide; and, as I said to my master some short time syne, who will be the flue then?"

CHAPTER XXV.

I do not love these ancient ruins—
We never tread upon them but we set
And, questioning, here in this open court,
(Which now lies naked to the injuries
Of stormy weather, some men lie interr'd,
Loved the Church so well, and gave so largely
to it,
They thought it should have canopied their bones
Till doomsday—but all things have their end,
Churches and cities, which have diseases like
to men,
Must have like death which we have.)
Duchess of Malfy.

The ruinous church of Saint Ninian had, in its time, enjoyed great celebrity; for that mighty system of Roman superstition, which spread its roots over all Europe, had not failed to extend themselves to this remote archipelago, and Zetland had, in the Catholic times, her saints, her shrines, and her relics, which, though little known elsewhere, attracted the homage, and commanded the observance, of the simple inhabitants of Thule. Their devotion to this church of St. Ninian, or, as he was provincially termed, St. Ringan, situated, as the edifice was, close to the sea-beach, and serving, in many points, as a landmark to their boats, was particularly obstinate, and was connected with so much superstitions ceremonial and credulity, that the reformed clergy thought it best, by an order of the Church Courts, to prohibit all spiritual service within its walls, as tending to foster the rooted faith of the simple and rude people around in saint-worship, and other erroneous doctrines of the Romish Church.

After the church of Saint Ninian had been thus denounced as
