England and America.

In few years' time the population of the United States will reach a hundred millions of English-speaking people, nearer to us in sentiment and institutions than any other nation can ever be, occupying a geographical position of supreme advantage, sharing with us a frontier line some 4,000 miles long and an increasing trade enormously greater than that interchanged by any two other states of the world. While European countries stagger under a heavy load of debt, the United States find their treasury balances almost an inconvenience. In manufacturing power, in all that proves national vigor, the inheritors of our old colonies already surpass any state except our own, and their full development as yet to come. The amount of British capital invested in that development effies estimate, and the interwoven interests of the kindred races have already reached a complexity which baffles the imagination. Money seeks investment in America as readily as if it were a portion of the empire, and no other markets act and react upon our own in the same degree. The mere existence of a state of war apart from its actual operations, would inflict a deadly blow to the whole fabric of British commerce. The thing should be inconceivable. As Lord Derby stone said of the occupation of London by a foreign army, "it must never be." The common sense of the many instinctively recognizes this, without, however, fully realising the utter disaster which such a war would entail; but the tacit recognition fails to reach the mind of the Foreign office, or to trace its impress upon the national policy. Meanwhile, the mind of the soldier, dazzled by the multitudinous glitter of German, French or Russian bayonets, is incapable of seeing either the paramount value of a friendly America, or the enormous potentiality for inflicting injury upon this country which exists beyond the Atlantic. Three thousand miles across the ocean mobilisation in the European sense is wholly superfluous, and the United States could without difficulty create, equip and maintain armies of any required strength, while they must already be ranked among great naval powers.

Moreover, a change is rapidly coming over the aspect of their foreign relations. "Why," asked Washington in his farewell address, "by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest or caprice?" "Because it is inevitable," is the answer which political and commercial evolution has dictated. The expansion of Great Britain and of Russia was not more inevitable than that the United States should take a leading place among the nations. Commercial entanglement has already grown up with one European power at least, and the construction of a powerful seagoing navy is but one of several signs of what must come. Could we be brought to realize the dominant position which the United States has already attained we should be less inclined to resent occasional manifestations of a sentiment which, in the case of Germany or France, would be esteemed as no mere arrogance.

There is only one power that could seriously injure Great Britain in war, or whose alliance would give real guarantee of peace. There is only one power whose material prosperity is intimately bound up with our own, and to whose external interests a British alliance would mean absolute security. If Lord Roseberry is able to inspire the Foreign Office with a conception of the United States existing and to be, an important step in laying the foundation of the national policy of the future will have been taken.—London, Eng., Speaker.

Progressive Conversation.

A substitute for progressive euchre has been found in progressive conversation. The game originated in the fertile brains of two women, who, owing to their inability to take a hand in the prevalent pastime invariably found themselves on the ragged edge of all social gatherings.

One was a minister's wife, who could not play from principle; the other was constitutionally unable to learn the science of any card game. Not to be outwitted, they put their heads together and the conversational progressive party is the result.

The limit is six tables. Four persons sit at each. A daintily decorated card bearing on one side the number and on the other twelve questions, is laid on each table. Four minutes' discussion of each question is allowed every guest. By the time the six tables have exchanged, every question will have been discussed by every guest. Each table votes upon the best conversationalist, and the aggregate of votes declares the victor, to whom a prize is awarded.

Imagine a clever company discussing the following questions, which were propounded at a recent brilliantly successful party:

1. What gift, as a woman, would you prefer above all others?
2. What city is the most beautiful that you have seen?
3. Of all the works of fiction of the day, which has attracted you the most?
4. Jokes or bon-mots, which occur to you as good?
5. Ought not women to wear their best costumes to Sunday services, and if not, why not?
6. What sound in all your life has moved you most?
7. Whom do you wish elected for President of the United States?
8. Why do we prefer fast trains when we are in no haste?
9. What occupation would you prefer if compelled to seek employment?
10. What do you regard as the best way to 'loaf and invite one's soul?'
11. The modern thraldom of women servants.
12. The pianoforte—do its tortures outweigh its pleasures?

Alaskana.

ALASKA IN DESCRIPTIVE AND LEGENDARY POEMS.

This work on "Alaska Legends" is the first one of its style yet published which deals exclusively with the legends, ethnology, customs and scenery of Alaska. Although the rhythm is in conformity with that of "Hiawatha" and "The Kalevala," this book claims distinction in that each chapter is complete in itself, no one depending upon another for either subject or conclusion. The descriptions of scenery are taken from the author's note-book, which was his constant companion while travelling in the Territory, therefore their reality is assured.

In following the Finnish verse, the author has taken the liberty of avoiding, in a great measure, the tautology for which "Hiawatha" is remarkable. Whether this slight innovation will be acceptable as an improvement or not remains with its readers to decide.

The writer, being a physician, has given considerable care and study to the "Medicine Men," or "Shamans," their peculiar education, strange practices, ostentatious manners, mode of collecting fees, their death and burial, all of which is interesting, and some parts are startling in their intense realism.

His faithful adherence to truth in recounting the customs of the people gives glimpses of them in very vivid light, and must awaken the sympathy of those who pause to think of the heathen-like darkness which instituted such dreadful practices.

The Legends are beautifully written, the vein of each followed strictly in accordance with the native legends, though where there are more than one version the author has chosen the most poetic for his poem. The weird beauty of the "Legend of Mt. Edgecumbe" is rivalled by the pathos in the "Legend of Yehl," the sparkling grandeur of the "Legend of the Large Glacier of Stickeen River," and the life-like diction of the legends of the "Raven" and the "Owl."

"Muir Glacier" is full of gorgeous, tinted splendor; "Moonlight" is lovely in its quiet tenderness; "Aurora" flashes its coloring in every line; and "Sunset" is a glorious benison to the whole book, which must be read before one can say that it has been too loudly praised.

The illustrations are few, but their exquisite beauty lends a great charm to the book, which is beautifully bound in cloth, with gilded edges. The illustrations are taken direct from photographs. Porter & Coates, publishers, Philadelphia.

Literary Notes.

Sir Charles Dilke—than whom there are few persons better qualified for the task—has written the article on London for the series of papers on the Great Capitals of the World, now being published in Harper's Weekly. It appears in the number issued October 5th, and is superbly illustrated. The same number will contain illustrations of the American fleet at Genoa, in connection with the Columbus celebrations at that place; an article, fully illustrated, on the return of Lieutenant Peary and the results of his expedition to the polar regions; and portraits of the principal athletes in the championship games of the present season.

The Century Magazine and Harper's New Monthly for October are to hand. Capital numbers both.

Governor McKinley is to speak in four Massachusetts cities during the presidential campaign. He spoke in Vermont before the late election and the Republican majority was reduced some eight thousand. Massachusetts Democrats are making calculations as to how a like ratio of decrease from a like cause will affect their chances. Mr. McKinley seems to be the Sir Richard Cartwright of the United States.
