WOMEN'S INTRAMURALS

NEW RULING GOOD OR BAD?

Before I get involved in the question of whether the new rule, instituted by the intramural department this week pertaining to women's broomball, will be beneficial or detrimental to the sport as a whole, I would first like to report on a couple of games which were played last week in the league. On Wednesday night, Third Floor Bernadine looked impressive in their win over Second Floor Bernadine. Paula Bradshaw looked good for the winners, and could easily become the leader of this team. On Tuesday night, the Day Students and Blanchard failed to ice complete teams, so a mini-match was held between those who did show. Looking around the league, people with definite potential in this sport include Gail Arsenault of Blanchard, Pat Moran of Second Floor Bernadine, and Lena Cassley of the Day Students. Each of these girls have contributed in a lot of different ways to their respective teams.

Now, on with the new rule. In effect, the rule says that "only girls who are out for solely recreational purposes may participate in the intramural broomball league." This ruling, then, does not allow anyone who plays in the P.E.I. Senior Women's Broomball League to also play in the intramural league. This new rule affects about fifteen people, the majority of whom play for the Lady Panthers in the P.E.I. League. I personally feel the rule has both advantages and disadvantages for the intramural league, and those who have participated regularly in both over the past season. The disadvantages seem to work in this manner. The people who participate in intramurals usually participate in each intramural activity, and not restrict themselves to one sport, or area of finesse. As a result you have a pretty good mixture of athletes and non-athletes competing in a relaxed environment. Now, if you say that people who play competitively are not allowed to also play recreationally, you seem to be gearing yourself towards a situation in which all intramurals will become accessible only to those who are not especially skilled in the particular sport being played. It in effect dictates that a person can play one or the other, i.e. recreationally or competitively, but not both. This would seem to eliminate a lot of people who have been combining the two successfully over the past couple of years. In fact, in most instances these people were very often the life and breath of the intramural department. Can the league survive without these people seems to be the biggest question left by the ruling.

In defense of the intramural department, it is understandable why such a rule would be instituted. The department is scared, and justifiably so, that intramurals will become a breeding ground for competitive athletics and this is not the philosophy behind intramurals. They are, on the other hand, there to provide students who don't possess the necessary skills or who do not want to play competitive athletics an avenue of participation. As it stands now, the level of ability of those who play competitive broomball in relation to those who play only recreational, is only slightly higher. However, as these players gain experience in the competitive league, this gap will continue to increase, until it no longer becomes a relatively homogenous group.

I hope, for everyone's sake, since future
