The Unlatched Door

CHAPTER I—PART I

"Enjoying yourself?" Roy Hemmery asked his partner, looking down at her slightly flushed face with a smile.

"It's just heavenly!" Barbara Calendar was beaming her little hands together enthusiastically, demanding an encore of the dance which had just ended. "I love dancing, and — all this!" — she glanced round the gay scene of which they were a part — "is simply wonderful to me. I live in the country, you know, and this is my first glimpse of night life in London."

"Are you staying with Martin Winterton?"

"Yes — at least, with Nancy, Mrs. Winterton. It's the same thing, isn't it? But Nancy is my friend; we were girls together. I hardly know him." The encore had been conceded and they were dancing again.

"It's the other way round with me," said Roy. "I never met Mrs. Winterton till tonight. In fact, I've only come across him in the way of business."

"Does he take care of your money for you?"

"What there is of it. That's precious little — now." A momentary cloud passed over his face. "He happens to be manager of the branch of the bank I shall be asking for an overdraft if things don't come my way soon."

"I hope they will," said Barbara earnestly. "I don't know much about that sort of thing, but isn't an overdraft rather beastly?"

"It would be for me!" he admitted. The shadow was on his face again, but it faded immediately as he looked down at her. "I say, you look — are you just being polite or would you really care if I were in trouble?"

"I hate to see anybody in trouble."

"Is that all?" There was unmistakable disappointment in his voice.

"What more did you expect?"

"It was more a hope than an expectation. I—I should have been so bucked if you had given me any reason—even a little one—to think that you took a bit of special interest in me."

"Why should I?"

"That's a nasty one!" He gave a rueful little laugh. "I can't think of a single reason why you should — unless it's one that I am frightfully interested in you."

"But you never saw me until half an hour ago!"

"Never! In my waking moments!"

"What does that mean?"

"Honestly, I don't know. All I do know is that as soon as I clapped eyes on you this evening I had a sort of feeling that I had seen you — no, not seen, but known — or, wanted to know — Look, here, this is getting fearfully mixed, isn't it? What I am trying to say is that as soon as I saw you I had a feeling as if all my best dreams had come true!"

"Oh! Did you feel that, too?" The words were out of Barbara's mouth before she knew what she was saying and it was only at Roy's exclamation that she realized it.

"Too?" he echoed. "Did you feel like that about me?"

"I—I—" she was stammering. The music had ceased again and the dancers were leaving the floor to return to their tables. Roy and Barbara were still standing where their last turn had brought them and, as if he had no consciousness of the exposed position in which they were, Roy remained with his arm round his partner, gazing straight into her eyes. "Don't!" she murmured. "Everybody will be looking!" She drew away from him and turned. Suddenly she uttered an ejaculation of surprise.

"What's the matter?" he asked.

"Nothing — nothing of any importance," she answered. "It was only a little astonished to see Mr. Borden in a place like this."

"Mr. Borden?" he repeated blankly, his glance following the direct-tion of hers. "What Mr. Borden?"

"You wouldn't know, of course. He has lately come to live near us at High Layley and I should never have thought him the kind of man to attend a cabaret. He is the big man getting up from that table where the lovely girl and those two queer-looking men are."

"That man?" Roy had identified the person at whom she was looking and a quick spasm of anger showed on his face. He made a step forward as though to dash towards the man but checked himself and fell back to Barbara's side. "Borden!" His manner had become studiously casual but it would not have needed very close observation to gather that he was in a state of suppressed excitement.

Barbara, however, was not noticing her companion. She had caught sight of her hostess in the act of resuming her seat at their table as the man with whom she had been dancing left her. Nancy was alone for the moment, her husband not being in sight, and Barbara saw her start violently.

"Yes," Barbara said automatically. "He is Mr. Roger Borden. He owns a bungalow—Oh! He is going to speak to Nancy and I don't think she wants him to!"

Nancy Winterton's expression certainly justified her friend's opinion. She had seen Roger Borden approaching her and a look almost of terror leapt into her eyes. She threw a hasty glance about the room; she might either have been seeking a way of escape or searching for other faces she feared to see watching her. Whatever her object, there was no chance to avoid an encounter with Borden for he was at her side before she had time to move.

DOROTHY DIX SAYS—

he doesn't like to save his money! No matter how much I preach to him he won't change. Should I take him to a psychologist?

M. M.

ANSWER: If you think your husband hasn't grown up, I don't think you have either. You two are so temperamentally unsuited that I don't see how you ever decided to marry. You entered matrimony with a preconceived idea that things would proceed exactly according to your plan: uncluttered house, money spent just as you wanted it spent, husband around when convenient but out of the way when his presence would interfere with housekeeping. The fact that hubby wants a home where he can keep the things he wants and be comfortable when he wishes was no part of your program. Well, my dear, either you make it part of your regime or marital disaster is in the offing. He should make some concessions to your passion for orderliness, but the major compromises will have to be yours.
