Candlelight Service At South Winsloe

South Winsloe Y. P. U. held a delightful Candlelight Service in the church on Sunday evening, December 21st.

The entire church was artistically decorated with spruce and red bows, and two lighted Christmas trees made a most effective setting. Over twenty lighted candles furnished the necessary light.

The service was capably conducted by the Y. P. U. president, Tillie Hamby, who gave the call to worship. Two different scripture passages were read by Marvin and Wayne Gillespie, followed by prayer offered by Preston Jenkins.

All then united in singing, "Angels From the Realms of Glory." Six Y. P. U. members, Kathleen Turner, Lillian Cole, Lona Turner, Er. Florence Gillespie and Helen and Veda Rodd presented a beautiful candlelight program. They entered from the back of the church, attired in white gowns with tinsel head dress, and each and every participant displayed splendid talent, in a really fine performance of the Christmas story.

At the conclusion the members walked very slowly down the aisles and took their places at the back of the church while a duet, "Silent Night" was most effectively and sweetly rendered by Mrs. Hardy and Eleanor Rodd.

Much credit for the evening's success is due to the Highfield choir who took complete charge of the music, with Mrs. Stillman Prizzell as organist. They rendered many favorite Christmas carols and also an anthem which was thoroughly enjoyed.

A Christmas message was given by Doris Hughes who vividly portrayed true happenings of Christmas in a children's home in Wisconsin of which Larva Anderson is superintendent. This was followed by the offering which was received by Ian Auld and Ernie Diamond and dedicated by Blythe Rodd.

At this time the president, Tillie Hamby, recited an inspiring Christmas recitation, followed by prayer offered by Mrs. Hardy.

The minister, Mr. Heber Hardy, just before the benediction was pronounced, congratulated the Young People on their service and in a few well chosen words, left a Christmas message with all present.

Members of the Y. P. U. and their families, together with the Highfield Choir, enjoyed an evening of song at the Manse, following the church service.

DOROTHY DIX'S COLUMN

and relatives feel I shouldn't go with him. Members of my immediate family like him very much.

ANSWER: You are qualified through years, background, and intelligence to judge the worth of the man yourself. If you are satisfied that the failure of his first marriage did not reflect on him, that he has severed all emotional ties with his first wife, and will undertake the obligations of family life with you, there's no reason why you shouldn't continue going with him.

DEAR MISS DIX: Do you think mothers should treat 14-year-old daughters like babies?

ANSWER: Some 14-year-old girls are pretty babyish. A girl can convince her parents that she is growing up only by acting grown up. As you assume more responsibility around the home, more privileges will be extended you. If you make a fuss and cry every time you are denied something you want, naturally, you'll be treated as a child.

Miss Nissen cannot reply personally to readers but will answer problems of general interest through this column.

VATICAN GREETINGS — Pope Pius XII, seated on the Papal throne, delivers his Christmas message to the world from Rome. He urged man to look to God rather than to man-made complex organizations and machines to solve the world's ills. The Pope directed a special message to the Iron Curtain nations where a fierce struggle against the Church rages.

At this time the president, Tillie Hamby, recited an inspiring Christmas recitation, followed by prayer offered by Mrs. Hardy.

The minister, Mr. Heber Hardy, just before the benediction was pronounced, congratulated the Young People on their service and in a few well chosen words, left a Christmas message with all present.

False Face

By E. C. Buley

Peter Marchant had been in captivity at Ellis Island for a fortnight, before he began seriously to doubt the wisdom of the course he had pursued. As the price of holding his tongue he had been offered a very short term of detention at Ellis Island, and subsequent deportation to England.

When he left the Court, he imagined that the bargain had been fairly kept.

He had made his choice in face of an alternative which seemed far more serious. He would have had to answer charges of grave assault, backed by something like perjury. And he would surely have created a scandal in which Marcia must be involved; a scandal likely to react most detrimentally upon his career.

Once at Ellis Island, he refused to answer questions or to make any statement. They might say that he was not Peter Marchant, but he refused to be anybody else. He was content to be nameless and a man of mystery, until deported to England, where he knew how to establish his own identity. After that, it might be possible to unravel the conspiracy against him, and bring the chief offenders to book.

The first suggestion that everything would not work out so simply was made by the doctor who had him under observation. This official, a grim and elderly man, came to his cubicle one morning, and regarded him in a searching and hostile fashion.

"See here," he began. "Do you still claim that you are the English artist Marchant?"

Peter smiled, but made no reply at all.

"I want an answer this time," the doctor said firmly. "You will do yourself no good by maintaining that stullen silence."

"What is the use of my making any claim?" Peter asked. "All you are after is some statement of mine, which you can use against me. I prefer to remain silent, if you don't mind."

"But I am seeking your own good," the doctor said. "See here! You went to a hotel where Marchant had been staying and claimed to be Marchant, although Marchant had sailed on the 'Berlinia' ten days before. Then you went to a dancer's apartment, and kicked up a dust; and at the cells you again claimed to be Marchant. Now, I want you to tell me whether or not you still think you are Marchant."

"If you put it that way," Peter replied, "I am damned well sure that I'm Marchant."

The doctor wagged his head, like a man well satisfied.

"The trouble about delusions," he said, "is that the sufferer is always sincere, and thoroughly convinced of the truth of his imaginings. They wouldn't be delusions, otherwise."

"I expected something like that," Peter retorted. "If I hold my tongue, I'm merely crazy; but when I answer your questions, you set out to prove me hopelessly insane."

"Anyhow you are sure that you are Marchant?"

"Yes; and able to prove it, if you will trouble to submit me to the tests which I suggest."

"Well, then; what do you make of these clippings?" the doctor asked triumphantly, setting before him a little sheaf of newspaper cuttings. Peter Marchant was staggered to read of his own indiscreet death in Paris; but he took his time, reading the clippings over twice, under the watchful eye of the doctor.

"Well?" that official asked finally. "What do you make of those clippings? Peter Marchant, not only called on the 'Berlinia', but he met his death in Paris."

"I never denied that somebody sailed on the 'Berlinia' with my papers, and in the berth reserved for me," Peter replied. "The same evilly-disposed person was clever enough to steal my effects from my hotel. Now, it seems, he has come to the bad end that might have been expected, over in Paris. In other words, doctor, the report of my death is grossly exaggerated."

"Very ingenious," sneered the doctor. "But who was this man, if he was not Marchant?"

"That's hardly the point," Peter retorted. "The question that really matters is this. Who am I, if I am not Marchant?"

"Just tell me that one little thing, and you'll be on your way to England in a few days," said the doctor, with a persuasive smile. "That is what you want isn't it? Well it is what the immigration authorities want also. But you must tell us who you are, and what you are, and how you came to be at large in New York without any papers at all."

"You do not accept my explanation," Peter said.
