ELLEN'S DIARY

By An Island Farmer's Wife And so in a body of cleaners, we decorated the old home of our girlhood - the ceilings and walls and floors, scrubbing, polishing, papering, painting, varnishing in a pattern a small woman has followed through the years, and was glad of the excuse that had gained us once more beneath the kindly old roof-tree.

"You know," one spoke up as she polished a window in the parlor that has known betrothals, weddings and christenings, such being a bit reflected not only the glow of her cleaning cloth but also bright old scenes in her mind "as children we always had a good time here - oh perhaps we didn't have the things we thought we wanted in the way of fine clothing and expensive toys, nor the privileges-so-called that some of our young friends had, but we always had plenty of food and were warmly clad. And they kept us to school, which meant a lot in those days."

"I didn't keep me there," an older one commented, recalling the stacks of dishes to be washed, "I went for sanctuary. Two things I never could bear were work and noise!" "But," the first continued "we had the best of parents - and weren't they the perfect team? You remember if we expected any indulgence from the distaff side over some order, all we got was well, your father has explained it to you - so what can we do but obey?"

"And wasn't it great," another broke in, "when we hurried through the work to have some fun?" "And don't you remember how nervously you checked in if you had dared to pass the ten o'clock ultimatum in a lingering 'Good-night?'" another laughed. "If you did," an older one chuckled, "you were braver than I. To my dying day I shall never know what it meant to prowl in alone past the zero hour!" "And our Sundays," one said remembering, "were so good - and our Christmas masses - and when all came home from college or teaching, wasn't it good then?" "With boy-friends dropping in" one offered, "James and the others -"

DOROTHY DIX SAYS -

Too Much Domesticity

Important For Married Couples To Keep Up Social Contacts One of the mistakes that a great many young married people make is in going too domestic as soon as they are married.

They even account it unto themselves for righteousness that they never go to parties or play golf or dance, and that they are always in bed by 11 o'clock and never seek any diversion wilder than a neighborhood movie or wheeling Junior out in his pram on Sunday afternoons.

The newweds may feel that they are sufficient unto themselves, and that they desire no society but each other's, but this is as unwholesome for them as if they tried to live upon an exclusive diet of one sort of food. We need variety in our mental menus as well as our physical ones. Otherwise we get fed up on even the daintiest fare and lose our appetite for it.

SEE TOO MUCH OF EACH OTHER The greatest menace to matrimony is that husbands and wives see too much of each other, anyway. They bore each other because they get overdone of each other's company.

They bore each other because they get overdone of each other's company. They know all of each other's troubles. For, having heard all of each other's jokes and stories and reminiscences over and over until they feel as if they were screaming if they have to listen to them one more time. Most families spend their evenings sitting up in a silence so thick you could cut it with a knife because they have simply talked out.

And this state of affairs is intensified if the husband and wife deliberately cut themselves off from association with other people and retire like hermits into the home cave. They are simply asking for trouble. For, having heard all of each other's jokes and stories and reminiscences over and over until they feel as if they were screaming if they have to listen to them one more time. Most families spend their evenings sitting up in a silence so thick you could cut it with a knife because they have simply talked out.

As a matter of fact, it can't be done. We have to get away from those we love to get a perspective on their charms. We have to try to entertain a dull dinner partner to realize how interesting and intelligent our own husbands and wives are, and how good it is to have someone to talk to who can catch a joke on the fly. It is the going away from home that makes us know how dear home is. Hence the young couple who wish to make a success of their marriage should recognize that it is just as important to step out now and then as it is to stay in most of the time.

And certainly it is narrowing to people to confine their interests and activities to the four walls of their home. It begets in men that selfishness expressed by the old man who prayed for the safety of "me and my wife, and my son John and his wife, and my four and no more," and who didn't care what happened to the balance of the world, provided their well-being was assured.

NEED-STIMULATION OF OTHERS We need to open our doors to others and to go through other people's doors; we need to make other people's joys and sorrows our own. And we need the stimulation that comes from association with those who are more intelligent than we are, and to brighten our wits by rubbing them up against sharper minds. No people are so self-centered, so opinionated, so self-satisfied as those who live just to themselves.
