A TELEGRAM
 Chapter 39

The letter went off and Dora began planning how she would look after the small boy. She told her father about it, who seemed delighted.

"If it's not too much for you," he said, "it's dull enough here to drive a stupid person crazy—and your young lady is very enough if you get a chance."

Dora smiled at the idea of being "lively." As the work slackened at the end of the harvest, she tried to rest a little. But in her run-down condition it was easier to work than to rest.

She tried to make over Gladys' old clothes into something becoming. Knowing nothing of styles she had to copy Gladys' new things which she knew did not suit her—and finally in despair made herself a couple of dresses with long basque waists and full skirts, with a full neck and sleeves—an extraordinary becoming fashion, for a housewife as quiet as an 1820 print.

"Francis would love the farm," she said to her father. "And if he's too ill to play indoors, I'll bring the big settee into the kitchen and talk to him while I work."

She remembered finally that she should ask her aunt for permission. Aunt Maude, whose cobalt absence hurt her a little about leaving Dora alone readily consented.

"I'd like to have her here to help me," she told her husband. "But he's not to hear of it."

"Why not?" Peter asked angrily. "Gladys has her own home now. He has no business interfering with ours."

"Well, but she thinks either that Dora likes Motion too much, or that he—"

"Daddy!" snapped Peter. But after a time he added, "If she comes here to stay with us, Jim will light out for months again, and I'll have to pay Bud Mason nearly twice as much to look after things out there. Jim will stay in Dora is there."

Which prudent and economical reason satisfied them both about leaving Dora where she was. December had come. Dora remembered that almost a year had gone since she first met Morten and liked him. The year seemed a lifetime, so much had happened.

"If only Francis comes, it won't be so bad," she said to herself. "I would have someone to look after them, someone being myself, to think about. Being happy must consist in thinking about others—the more I remember all my past life and the more I think about what is to happen to me the more unbearable all this becomes."

The fair in Winter was not cheerful. Aunt Maude took the best looking furnishings to town. Gladys had helped herself to a lot of pie, brown, mostly wet and cold, the vegetable garden, beans of dark earth and frozen, starkly naked stalks of dead plants. The front lawn was a wet brown mat of last summer's grass. Knob Hill a cold protrusion of earth that shut off the good-winds from view. She hated to look at Knob Hill, because she had loved it so much before.

A week or more passed and there was no answer to her letter.

"She's forgotten me," she told her father. "People always do. Or else she thinks it presumptuous of me to ask for Francis. She must have so many friends that would look after him—or else she's found a nurse—or a pleasant place for him to go."

"I'm not good for anything, but I could take care of him and I'd like to do so much," she said later.

One raw wet day a boy in a blue uniform drove out to the farm—the messenger boy from the station telegraph office.

"Did you get my letter?" he asked, "I'm not good for anything, but I could take care of him and I'd like to do so much," she said later.

Mr. Stewart asked why the government had accepted the tender of the Canada Ingot Iron Company—an American firm with only a branch factory in Canada—for the supply of iron culverts, when a tender for the same figure had been put in by the Pedlar Peoples, Ltd., a Canadian company employing two hundred returned soldiers, and when a satisfactory guarantee had been furnished through the company's agents, the Rogers Hardware Co., Ltd. A full report of this question brought up by Mr. Stewart has already been published in The Guardian, together with Hon. Mr. Crosby's answer.

Mr. Kennedy: About these roads. They seem to start at Charlottetown and end at Summerside. Last year the government expended on this end as far as Hunter River I first roads to be done would be the don't know how many dollars. They most important.
