ELLEN'S DIARY

by an Island Farmer's Wife

So obvious now is the pattern of Spring. It is on a twig just outside the window, in the grace of a small song sparrow's unlifted head and run of winsome notes. It is—yes, now at Alderlea, in the sight of a robin on the lawn, a shy fellow, moving in the shelter of the shrubs in the border. It is in bud and branch—and the sky, times as sunny and clear and bright as a small one's eyes or adorned with the great fleecy, lazy clouds which belong to warming days.

For April brings them: the pleasant sunny spells of warmth, which as they call the fowls and ewes to range in near fields, bring out the housewives to new discoveries in garden and about.

But this week had too its cold winds, searching and strong, showers on the windows and April snow to fall and lie briefly and vanish from the quiet hillsides.

At this house at Alderlea, we remember that this has been an inactive week. Not that we would have had it so, but that we two had been over-taken by the prevailing flu. Not as we said, we who have been its victims in odd former years, that it was actually so distressing this time as such miseries go, other than it left us with depleted energy. It was easy to remain in bed or rising drop into the first comfortable chair that offered and look with little curiosity or enthusiasm on our world about.

James was—and is the more miserable. He drew a week in bed, an ultimatum as we have said not too difficult to respect. However each day brought its measure of improvement and shortly we hope to be back to our former good health and more and less busy rounds again.

Sickness can be an asset, some one points out. "An enforced holiday in bed, blamelessly releases us from a too-busy world, sharpens our mental and spiritual perceptions and permits a clearer perspective on our lives." Yet impatient to be well we usually miss these points of gain.

"This time of day, Ellen, it's always so nice at the barns," James in the old armchair, said this evening with much longing. "Getting the stock fed, the milking done and everything made comfortable for the night—I always enjoyed that. . . . But in a day or two" he nodded quietly "this will pass."

And we shall spread meals for a busy, hungry man to come to setting the tea to draw smartly at the sound of a step at the door. Again we shall go blithely to our work, to the house-clearing, taking time—how we shall like it—to watch the seasons break, come to fulfillment and go.

Sun and wind and showers the week brought . . . and April snow.

"This snow is mad; it does not stay. A footprint even blows away. It catches upon bud and stem. Revealing, not concealing them. And whitening the garden, shows the spears of tulips set in rows. It is too scatterbrained to hide. The pattern of the Spring outside."

Until Monday — Good-night —

A Bowl of Onion Soup For A Steaming Start

By Ida Bailey Allen

"Onion soup for breakfast! A new idea? Not at all, Madame. In France, it has been a staple first-in-the-morning food for generations. Any visitors to Les Halles, the market place of Paris, join the farmers, dealers, rich man, poor man and eat onion soup. And everybody enjoys it."

"I can match that, Chef. For one whole year, I had onion soup for breakfast and loved it! I still often choose it for breakfast."

"With it, I like a slice of toasted protein bread. As a starter, I prefer grapefruit, and to top off, a big cup of coffee with hot milk. "When eaten for breakfast, I find this balanced combination averts mid-morning fatigue, and helps to slim and trim!"

For Sunday Brunch

"And for Sunday Brunch, Madame, I shall make it even more substantial. I will add a slice of deconstructed toasted thick bread with a well-poached egg perched on it into an almost filled bowl of soup. For a crisp accompaniment, have two slices of crisp bacon."
