Strange But True

tury. They got their name from the habit of wearing white linen that enclosed the body all but the eyes. Their prophet was named Ellas and in 1399, they planned to wrest the Holy land from the Turks when Pope Boniface caused their army of 40,000 to be dispersed. Their leader was put to death. . . . Watch-night was a sort of service held by the Methodists on the last night of the old year, and the beginning of the New. This custom started in Bristol, England, but was not brought into general use until the time of Charles Wesley. The custom is still in use though not observed to the same extent as it formerly was. . . . In some rivers of Japan the fisher folk use comorans to do their fishing for them. Here's how: a light is used to attract the fish and the birds are then released to catch 'em.
But, and there is a "but", a string is attached to the birds' necks to keep them from escaping, and they can't gobble up the fish because they have elastic rings fastened about their throats. . . . Ignorant and superstitious people are disatisfied with any treatment by a medicine unless it includes a bottle of some vile-tasting concoction or a box of sugar-coated pills.
