ADAM BEDE.

CHAPTER XLIII.

Why did they say she was so changed? In the corpse we love, it is the likeness we see —it is the likeness, which makes itself felt the more keenly because something else was and is not. There they were—the sweet face and neck, with the dark tendrils of hair, the long dark lashes, the rounded cheek and the pouting lips; pale and thin—yes, but like Hetty, and only Hetty. Others thought she looked as if some demon had cast a blight upon her, withered up the woman's soul in her, and left only a hard despairing obstinacy.

But the mother's yearning, that competent type of the life in another life which is the essence of real human love, feels the presence of the cherished child even in the debased, degraded man; and to Adam, this pale, hard-looking culprit was the Hetty who had smiled at him in the garden under the apple-trees bought—she was that Hetty's corpse, which he had trembled to look at the first time, and then was unwilling to turn away his eyes from.

But presently he heard something that compelled him to listen, and made the sense of sight less absorbing. A woman was in the witness box, a middle-aged woman, who spoke in a firm distinct voice. She said:

'My name is Sarah Stone. I am a widow, and keep a small shop licensed to sell tobacco, snuff, and tea, in Church Lane, Stoniton. The prisoner at the bar is the same young woman who came, looking ill and tired, with a basket on her arm, and asked for a lodging at my house on Saturday evening, the 27th of February. She had taken the house for a public, because there was a figure against the door. And when I said I didn't take in lodgers, the prisoner began to cry, and said she was too tired to go anywhere else, and she only wanted a bed for one night. And her prettiness, and her condition, and something respectable about her clothes and looks, and the trouble she seemed to be in, made me as I couldn't find it in my heart to send her away at once. I asked her to sit down and gave her some tea, and asked her where she was going, and where her friends were. She said she was going home to her friends; they were farming folks a good way off, and she'd had a long journey that had cost her more money than she expected, so as she'd hardly any money left in her pocket, and was afraid of going where it would cost her much. She had been obliged to sell most of the things out of her basket, but she'd thankfully give a shilling for a bed. I saw no reason why I shouldn't take the young woman in for the night. I had only one room but there were two beds in it, and I told her she might stay with me. I thought she'd been led wrong and got into trouble, but if she was going to her friends, it would be a good work to keep her out of farther harm.'

The witness then stated that in the night a child was born, and she identified the baby-clothes then shown to her as those in which she had herself dressed the child.

'These are the clothes. I made them myself, and had kept them by me ever since my last child was born. I took a deal of trouble both for the child and the mother.
I couldn't help taking to the little thing and being anxious about it. I didn't send for a doctor, for there didn't seem no need.
I told the mother in the day time she must tell me the name of her friends, and where they lived, and let me write to them. She said, by-and-by she would write herself, but not to-day. She would have no nay, but she would get up and be dressed, in spite of everything I could say. She said she felt quite strong enough, and it was wonderful what spirit she showed. But I wasn't quite easy what I should do about her, and toward evening I made up my mind I'd go, after meeting was over, and speak to our minister about it. I left the house about half-past eight o'clock. I didn't go out at the shop door, but at the back door, which opens into a narrow alley.
I've only got the ground floor of the house, and the kitchen and the bedroom both look into the alley. I left the prisoner sitting up by the fire in the kitchen with the baby on her lap. She hadn't cried or seemed low at all, as she did the night before. I thought she had a strange look with her eyes, and she got a bit flushed toward evening. I was afraid of the fever, and I thought I'd call and ask an acquaintance of mine, an experienced woman, to come back with me when I went out. It was a very dark night. I didn't fasten the door behind me; there was no lock; it was a latch with a bolt inside, and when there was nobody in the house I always went out at the shop door.
But I thought there was no danger in leaving it unfastened that little while. I was longer than I meant to be, for I had to wait for the woman that came back with me. It was an hour and a half before we got back, and when we went in, the candle was burning just as I left it, but the prisoner and the baby were both gone. She'd taken her cloak and bonnet, but she'd left the basket and the things in it. I was dreadful frightened, and angry with her for going.
I didn't go to give information, because I'd no thought she meant to any harm, and I knew she had money in her pocket to buy food and lodging. I didn't like to set the constable after her, for she'd a right to go from me if she liked.'

The Franchise Bill.

Sir John Macdonald, on moving the second reading of the franchise bill, said the object of the measure was simply to provide a system of representation which would be equitable or uniform in all the provinces.
The British North America act contemplated that the franchise existing in the different provinces should be used for representation in the Dominion legislation.
The result was that the present condition of the electoral franchise was altogether anomalous, and should not longer exist in a country owning and drawing its inspiration from free institutions. At the outset it was a necessity that the provincial franchise should apply, because there was no parliament to settle upon a Dominion franchise.
But that necessity had long disappeared, and it was an anomaly and contrary to the first principles of popular representation that the Federal parliament should not have control of the franchise by which its members are elected. The government thought no time was more appropriate for revising the franchise than the present.
Recently a franchise act had been passed by the legislature of Ontario, and several other provinces were moving in the same direction, and there might be acts passed at any time by the provincial bodies which would, by changing the franchise, sweep away the constituencies upon which this parliament is elected. The bill proposed a decided enlargement of the franchise in regard to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec and probably also in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. There was also a provision in the bill in which personally he was warmly interested, and that was the clause extending the franchise to women. (Cheers.) It was well known that Mr. Gladstone and many English statesmen were in favor of giving widows and unmarried women possessing the requisite property the right to vote, but he would be glad if it should come about that Canada should be the first to embody this principle in the law of the land. In order to test the feeling of the house a clause for women suffrage had been inserted in the bill and he would be sorry if it did not receive the support of a majority of the house.
(Cheers.)
