And until we meet once more
You'll be ever in my heart dear
Then and now and evermore.

Long-Lost N.S. Stone Is Sought In Toronto

By JOHN LeBLANC

TORONTO (CP) — A long-lost stone whose inscription provides one of the oldest links with Nova Scotia's first French settlers—and also a historic puzzle—may be brought to light in the demolition of an 86-year-old building in the heart of Toronto's business section.

It is Nova Scotia's "Masonic stone," bearing the date 1606 and the Masonic square and compasses, whose discovery in 1827 and disappearance in 1876 has stirred up speculation for historians down through the decades.

The stone, found on the shores of Annapolis Basin, has been described as perhaps the oldest inscription stone in North America. Some Masonic students and historians also have theorized that it is a symbol of the earliest trace of Freemasonry on this continent.

How it got into the news as workmen prepared to rip down an ancient brick building just a block off teeming Yonge Street to make way for a parking lot, is the story of a long trial for a weather-worn stone—and of a classic bungle.

FOUND NEAR GRANVILLE

Judge Thomas Chandler Haliburton, Nova Scotia historian-author, wrote in 1829 of it having been found near Granville, at the site of the first land cleared for cultivation in Nova Scotia by the French. Its carved figures antedate the founding of Quebec by two years.

While students still puzzled over the stone's significance, Haliburton around 1856 passed it on to a son, Robert, who later entrusted it to Sandford Fleming, the railway builder who was later to become known as the father of Standard time.

Fleming had it brought to Toronto, where it was the subject of a paper before the Canadian Institute, the scientific society that was predecessor to the present Royal Canadian Institute. It stayed in the institute's building.

When the institute was putting up a new building in 1876 —the one about to be torn down —orders were given to have the stone built into the walls of one of the main rooms with the inscription exposed.

In a paper about the stone in 1950, R. V. Harris of Halifax, Masonic past grand master for Nova Scotia who has made a study of the relic, said it was reported that "the mason very stupidly covered it over with mortar and even the spot could not afterwards be traced, although the mortar has been removed at several spots to look for it."

REWARD OFFERED

Fleming offered a $1,000 reward and the building through the years has been searched from attic to cellar several times.

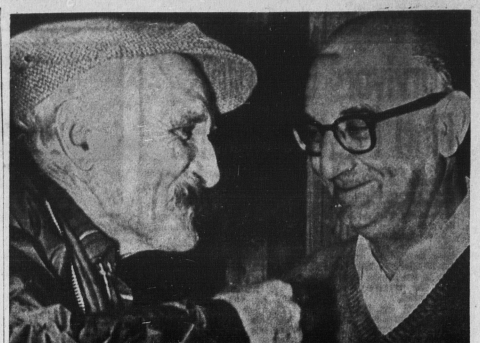
Fleming's own connection with the crumbling structure remains on display, for an outside plaque labels it as the Birthplace of Standard Time—the result of a speech he delivered there which stimulated international action on time.

The building passed to the Sons of England and eventually to City Parks Limited, which is razing it for a car park and which will instruct workmen to watch for the stone during demolition.

"If found, it will be returned to its original owners," the company said.

The ownership may take some settling. Mr. Harris notes that when the Royal Canadian Institute sold the building to the Sons of England, the deed specified that the stone, when and if found, is its property.

But he also notes that the younger Haliburton turned it over to Fleming on the distinct understanding it was on loan and to be returned to Haliburton on demand. Just who would make the demand today might be a legal and historic poser.



JOEY CHANGES COSTUME FOR ROAD OPENING

Newfoundland's Premier Joey Smallwood, his usual black suit and bow tie exchanged for a light tan sweater, pauses to talk to Hibbert Caines, a 74-year-old fisherman at Portland Creek during a road-opening tour up Newfoundland's great northern peninsula. The road links communities on the peninsula to the province's highway network after generations of almost complete isolation.
