INDIA TO BORROW 10,000 MEN OUT OF WORK LONDON, June 19.—Underwriting arrangements have been completed for the issue of the 5 1/2 per cent Indian loan of 12,500,000 pounds at 96. The money is to be used mainly for railway maintenance. This announcement has caused a general depression and an easing off in the gilt edged market of the Stock Exchange, where conditions recently have been dull and the opinion has been against such a large issue of fresh capital at present.

GERMANY PAYS INSTALMENT OF 50,000,000 GOLD MARKS LONDON, June 19.—The West Minister Gazette this morning says it understands a threatened crisis concerning German reparations has at least been postponed by the payment of the 5,000,000 gold marks by Germany due Thursday.

SCOTS GUARDS DELIGHTED LONDON, June 19.—The Scots Guards band has arrived home from Canada, delighted with their Canadian tour, which they describe as the greatest joy of their lives. The bandmen declare that Canada is ready to welcome similar visits from other British bands.

GERMAN STEAMER STOPPED BY BRITISH WARSHIP DANAE LONDON, June 19.—Both skirts and tempers are longer in England than in the United States, according to George McManus, the cartoonist who sailed for home this week on board the Majestic. He added: "The English people are carrying their anxiety better than the people of America. They have quite as much to worry about, but they don't appear as unstrung."

REYFEST, June 19.—The German steamer, Stella Maris, bound from Hamburg to Cork, was stopped by the British warship Danae last night. Two ships were fired across the bow of the steamer. Today she was towed to a shipyard for a search of her cargo.

OTTAWA, June 19.—Estimates on unemployment covering eight of the nine provinces of the dominion to Saturday, June 10, show what labor department officials consider a remarkable decrease in the number of men out of work at the present time. In some parts of the dominion in fact, there is stated to be a demand for men for seasonal work, such as small fruit picking which is impossible to fill at present.

Ontario had the greatest number of unemployed according to information obtained on Saturday's estimates, with 10,511. At the same time some parts of the province offered work for more men than were available in those districts.

COOLING OFF. Old Gentleman: "You haven't been quarrelling with that young man who calls on you, have you, Emily?" Emily: "Why no, pa; why do you ask such a question?" Old Gentleman: "I noticed that he has kept away somewhat lately. He has only been here six times this week so far."

Women With Gems

(Continued from Page 1) precious stones. The police believe an international gang is busy, but so far little or nothing has been recovered. The "internationals" are also working fake lotteries and fake bookmaking concerns. Reports from Belgium indicate that these lotteries have brought millions of francs into the pockets of the internationals, and the Belgian police are co-operating with Scotland Yard to run down the crooks. Another lucrative pastime of the international crooks since the war has been the disposing of so called royal jewels. If all the jewels reported to have belonged to the ill-fated Russian royal family had really belonged to them they would have had to carry them about in suitcases. Nevertheless a considerable amount of the treasures once possessed by Europe's deposed royal families and their hangers on have come on the market, and the crooks have made big hauls in smuggling them from one country to another. The American authorities discovered some months ago that crooks were signing on certain American mercantile ships as seamen to try to smuggle diamonds into the United States. In pre-war days one flourishing trade of the internationals and here in Atlantic liner. Although some of the big liners still display the "Beware of the Card Sharper's" warning in their smoke-rooms, few big coups by the crooks have been reported since the war. One reason is the stringency of the American passport regulations which have kept at home many European sharpers.

A Padre in the Great War

(Continued from Page 1) feet away in the middle of the road was the smoke of an exploded shell. "Well," I said, "you had better go on or there will be another one pretty soon, and it may get us." With extraordinary speed we hurried to our destination, where I felt the car, taking my pack with me. I told the driver, much to his relief, that he could go home, and that when I wanted the car again I would send for it.

LOST AGAIN

The quarry was, as I have said, our Battle Headquarters, and here in the deep dusk when I had visited previously I found our staff hard at work. They told me that this was "Y" day, and that zero hour when the barrage would start was at 5.20 the next morning. At that hour we were to cross the Canal and then press into the country beyond. We had two battalions with us to make the attack and be followed up by the other battalions in the 1st, and 3rd, Brigades. When these had reached their objective the 2nd Brigade was to "leap frog" them and push on to Hayneourt and beyond. I was glad that I had come to the quarry, and that here, those parting instructions were not to do anything foolish. I got out of the quarry and made my way down the hill towards Inchy. A railway bridge which crossed the road near me was a constant mark for German shells, and it was well to avoid it. An officer met me and asked where I was going. I said "I don't know but I think the Spirit is leading me to the old 14th Battalion in Bulsey Switch Trench." He told me the direction to take which was to cross the road and follow the line of the railway. The tins of milk and bully beef cut into my back so I stopped at a culvert and sat on the ground and cooled off. There was no sign of Bulsey Switch anywhere, but I got up and went on. The evening was closing in by this time, and, as I am never good at seeing in the dark, it began to be difficult to keep from tripping over things. At last the road brought me to a trench in which I found the 14th Battalion. They were getting ready to move off at midnight and wait in the wood by the edge of the Canal until the barrage opened. It made one proud to be with those young men that evening and think what they were called upon to do. What difficulties they would encounter in the Canal they did not know. They said they might have to swim. We hoped, however, that there was not much water as the Canal was still unfinished. I said good bye to them and wished them all good luck. Crossing the road I entered another trench, where I found the 13th Battalion and beyond them came the 1st Battalion. By this time it was dark and rainy and the ground was very slippery. I had to find my way along the trench. A company of the 4th Battalion who were to be in the first wave of the attack, passed going forward to take up their position for the following morning. Probably never in the war had we experienced a moment of deeper anxiety. The men would have to climb down one side of the canal, rush across it and climb up the other. It seemed inevitable that the slaughter would be frightful. At home in the cities of Canada things were going on as usual. Professors were preparing up their piles of gold. Politicians were carrying on the Government or Working in Opposition, in the interests of their parties. The men were in mud and rain, weary and drenched to the skin, young Canadians were waiting to go through the valley of the shadow of death in order that Canada might live.
