right?"

"No, Billy", the Captain replied, "What about something that is half right, or almost correct? There are differing theories as to which something can be wrong and what needs to be done is for us to define them. There are many uses for wrong answers ..."

At this point, Billy could not help but interrupt. "Besides using bird cages, Captain?" he asked. But the Captain was in no mood to be toyed with and admonished Billy — "Don't be smart. I'm the mentor here, not you. Remember, I've been a trawler Captain for over thirty years and a T.V. star for many more. You'll have to study a lot more if you want to catch wits with me."

"Just trying to be helpful, Captain," exclaimed the tot, trying to hide his smirk, "Sorry I said anything."

The wizened old salt ran a cold eye over Billy, a look that, far from having its intended effect, sent Billy into an inner glow of glee. Billy like to get the old boy mad. He hoped that one day the captain would get so angry he'd take a heart attack and die, leaving Billy with the rights to the monumental highliner fish processing industry, but he knew this would never happen. All those years of eating nothing but fish products had left the Captain's arteries as clean as can be. At last there was something to be said for the Captain's generated way of life.

Content that Billy was again attentive, he continued, "You're forgiven, Billy, my boy. Now, can you think of a definition for an exactly wrong answer?"

Billy sighed and took a guess — "That which is the opposite of the right one?", he said.

"Wrong! Exactly wrong is not always the opposite. Oh, it is with an answer like 'white' or yes and no answers, but not about an answer like 'A cheeseburger', or 'Tuesday'?"

"Or 'blue' or 'yellow'?", interjected Billy.

"No Billy, most people don't know it but every color has an opposite, Billy. You can look on a colour wheel and find the opposite of blue or yellow or green. It's the colour that turns the original black when you mix it with the first."

"Gee, Captain, is that true? I wasn't aware of that aspect of the light spectrum. I always thought of colours as differing vibrational frequency relationships of electromagnetic radiation. Well, you know so much. Tell me more, Skipper."

The Captain leaned back and stroked his white captain's beard, not sure if Billy was ribbing him again. He decided to let it be a night. "Not tonight, little Billy. We'll pick this up tomorrow. It's late now, past your bedtime, and I have yet to tend to the light."

"Aw gee Captain, can't we discuss this a little longer? At least until the trawlers go by outside?", said Billy, actually glad that it was over and that he could escape to his room, "This is such an interesting and undeveloped field. I would really like to pursue it further." But as he knew, Captain Highliner wanted his gin and refused, so Billy toddled off, leaving him a practiced look of dismay.

"Goodnight, Billy", the Captain called after him, "We'll pick this up in the morning" and waited until little Billy had closed his door before going up to the tower where his still and philosophy books waited.

Billy was not the Captain's favourite person. He knew the Captain was just playing along and didn't have a speck of interest in high philosophical matters. Yet he felt a sense of duty to check the tot these important matters.

"Arr", he thought, "The boy will learn soon enough not to mess with Captain Highliner." And with that he went up the tower to his 'Thought Room'.
