PROFESSOR BAIRD SEARCHING FOR THE WINTER HOME OF THE MACKEREL.

"On the last cruise of the United States Fish Commission's steamer Albatross," said Professor Spencer F. Baird to a New York Herald reporter, the other day "thirty new species of fish were brought to the surface. They had never before been seen. We have been dredging recently in very deep water. In fact, the trawl has been used in a deeper sea than ever before known. Don't know what a trawl is! Well, it is a drag net attached to an 11-foot beam with runners 2 1/2 feet high at each end; a net 20 feet long is strung along the beam and the apparatus is heavily weighed. On putting it overboard it immediately sinks to the bottom and the drags are made from half a mile to three miles. These drags are made in what is known as the 3,000 fathom hole—a depression in the sea bottom of about one hundred and fifty miles in extent, lying in the Gulf of Mexico south of Martha's Vineyard."

"And the piscatorial find?" "Amounted to nothing except from a scientific point of view. The fish, as all fish are that are found at great depth, are small and not edible."

"But the fish are christened?" "Yes, of course. Mr. James E. Benedict, the resident naturalist on board the Albatross, preserves the collection of fish discovered on the cruise. The fish are then sent to the summer laboratory of the United States Fish Commission at Wood's Hole, Mass. Some are also forwarded to Professor A. E. Verrill, at Yale College, and some to Washington. At these three places the fish are named."

"But you must know," continued Professor Baird, "that this deep dredging is only incidental to the chief object of the cruise. We are now busily employed in endeavoring to find the winter home of the common mackerel. Should we be successful, it will open a winter fishing ground in which millions of dollars will be made. Captain Z. L. Tanner, of the Albatross, during the last trip has been endeavoring to trace the mackerel to its winter quarters. At the approach of cold weather these fish leave the coast. They have been followed to the northern edge of the Gulf Stream, east of Nantucket. There the fishermen lose them. The exact spot is called the Fishing rip, about forty miles from shore. The fish disappear in the stormy November weather, leave the surface and sink out of sight. The Albatross, which is now lying at the Navy Yard at Brooklyn, will leave here on Wednesday next. Captain Tanner has instructions to examine the coast between here and Cape Hatteras for the mackerel. They have never been seen south of the Cape, and it is only a question of time when the commission will discover their home and open one of the largest winter fishing grounds in the world."

A St. Petersburg despatch says the second number of a Socialist journal issued by the students of Chesty declares that despite the miserable condition of the peasantry the Socialist propaganda has not made the progress expected. It says two hundred students have been expelled in a body from the commercial school at Belaja Zerkow, and no reason has been assigned for such summary action. Also that students of noble birth in the Constantinian military school at St. Petersburg have been required to furnish a list of their acquaintances, the alleged motive being the finding of compromising documents in their possession.
