CONTRACT BRIDGE
By B. JAV BECKER

Eventually, South took a club finesse which lost to the queen. A spade return then defeated declarer one trick.

The facility of attempting to ruff a spade in dummy should have been apparent to declarer at trick two when a trump was returned. The defense had properly evaluated the situation and were evidently bent on preventing declarer from ruffing his third spade in dummy.

In effect, by leading a spade at trick three, South staked the contract on the club finesse. While the finesse might have succeeded and brought home the contract, declarer was guilty of putting all his eggs in one basket.

He could have improved his chances substantially by a different approach to the play. When the heart is returned at trick two, declarer does best by winning the trick in his own hand and leading a low club to the jack.

If the finesse succeeds, he has ten top tricks and need not worry about what happens to the third spade. If, as in the actual case, the club finesse loses, all is not yet lost. East wins, and let's say, leads another trump.

Declarer gets to his hand by ruffing a diamond, draws the outstanding trump, and then makes the contract because the adverse clubs happen to be divided 3-3.

Obviously, this is a better line of play, since it gives declarer two chances to make the hand instead of one.

Arctic Settlements Wait As Summer Supplies Move
By DON HANRIGHT
Canadian Press Staff Writer
EDMONTON (CP)—The Mackenzie River fleet has begun its annual summer task of restocking northern cupboards.

The 30-odd boats and 100 barges operating along the 1,400-mile route from Alberta railheads to the Arctic Ocean are expected to handle a record tonnage. Some estimates are that it will increase 10 per cent over last year's peak 222,284 tons.

It's a big, expensive business crowded into a four-month navigation season, starting in late May and ending in October with the freezeup that sends boats scurrying into the nearest ports. Last fall, three vessels were caught in the ice.

AWAIT SUPPLIES
From Yellowknife to Tuktoyaktuk, dozens of Arctic and sub-Arctic settlements are waiting for shipments of fuel oil, machinery, building materials, food and clothing. When navigation closes, they will be left with only supplies by aircraft.

The northern customers, who pay roughly $5,000,000 for the water transport—most of it to Crown-owned Northern Transportation Company, which handles close to 80 per cent of all freight moving in the Canadian north. For Edmonton suppliers, it's a $50,000,000-a-year business.

Most of the shipping begins at Waterways, the Northern Alberta Railway terminus 250 miles north of Edmonton. From there, it's 1,400 miles to Tuktoyaktuk, where the Mackenzie—with headwaters, Canada's longest river—empties into the Beaufort Sea.

The first leg—and the first navigational problem—is down the north-flowing Athabasca River 100 miles to Lake Athabasca. Where river meets lake, water is shallow in late summer, and river channels shift so frequently they cannot be charted.

From there, nearly half Northern Transportation's load is carried westward across the 3,058-square-mile lake to burgeoning Uranium City in northeastern Saskatchewan. The rest moves north down the Slave River to Great Slave Lake.

MUST SKIRT RAPIDS
Adding to the high cost of northern freight is a 16-mile series of rapids on the lower Slave, between Fort Fitzgerald, Alta., and Fort Smith, administrative centre of the Northwest Territories. All goods must be trucked around the rapids.

About 80 miles across Great Slave Lake is one of the fleet's biggest ports of call—Yellowknife. From there, it's mostly clear sailing along the Mackenzie to Fort Providence, Fort Simpson, Norman Wells, Fort Good Hope, Arctic Red River, Aklavik and its new East Three townsite, Tuktoyaktuk, and the Arctic Coast.

There is one other portage. It extends nine miles along the Great Bear River, which empties 11,000-square-mile Great Bear Lake into the Mackenzie. Again, goods bound for Port Radium on the lake's eastern shore must be trucked around the river rapids.

F. M. Broderick, general manager of Northern Transportation, says the swift-flowing Great Bear River is one of the northern operators' biggest headaches. On one 38-mile river stretch, boats move downstream in less than three hours. Getting back up the same stretch takes 12 to 13 hours.

Much of Northern Transportation's expected 10-per-cent boost in tonnage will come from operation of the last of the three river boats owned by the Hudson's Bay Company. HBC colors, first seen on canoes and York boats 135 years ago, have disappeared along the Mackenzie.

The federally-owned firm also will increase its supply of DEW line radar stations along the Arctic Coast this year. Details of this operation are not available. United States vessels have hauled the bulk of the supply in previous years.

PICK WEEKLIES' HEAD WINNIPEG (CP)—Eugene Derksen of the Steinbach Carillon Post was elected president of the Manitoba Weekly Newspaper Association Friday at its 39th annual convention here. He succeeds M. A. (Mel) MacDonald of Pilot Mound.
