

Scientist Says AEC Too Optimistic On Bomb Tests

By FRANK CAREY
STORRS, Conn. (AP) — An Atomic Energy Commission staff scientist took issue Monday with the majority of the commission itself regarding a statement he said took "an unjustifiably optimistic view" of the potential hazards from atomic tests.

Radioactive strontium is one of the most dangerous products released in the detonation of A-bombs. Many atomic experts including the AEC itself have said that it is potentially the most hazardous of all fall-out materials provided enough of it accumulates in the body. This is because it has a tendency to be retained in the bone structure and therefore might cause bone cancer if enough of it were present in a body.

"objected" to a recent statement by at least one member of the five-man AEC commission that "it appears that at the present level of weapons testing, the present and potential contribution of strontium 90 to the world ecology is not a significant factor."

There are in Canada today, he said, almost 17,000 doctors; of these, just over 11,000 by last count are members of the Canadian Medical Association.

Reference was made to the value of the Association's Medical Journal and to its representations in connection with the Income Tax Act.

Dr. Eric Found will be chairman at the afternoon session when Dr. R. C. Dickson, Professor of Medicine, Dalhousie University will speak on "Treatment of Haemorrhage of the G. I. Tract."

Dr. Lemieux recalled that in 1867 Canadian thinking was dominated by the concept of union, which resulted Confederation. It was in this atmosphere that the leader of medical thinking gathered in Quebec, in Confederation year, to lay the foundations of the Canadian Medical Association.

Dr. Tupper's words on this occasion, formed a connecting link between the members of the medical profession become better acquainted with each other, and consult respecting the best means of elevating the profession and advancing its interests, and thereby advancing the interests of the people as a whole.
