

Let's Talk It Over

The way the stock car drivers strap themselves in, and wear crash helmets to protect themselves in case of possible, (or perhaps we should say "probable") collision reminds us of an article we read some time ago on safety precautions that might be taken in ordinary, every-day car driving.

Certainly the number of untimely deaths caused by motor accidents on the highways is one of the biggest problems of our modern age. Constructing two-lane highways, straightening out the curves, and making other highway improvements have apparently not helped.

It is also doubtful whether more stringent regulations in licensing drivers, important as that is, would make any appreciable improvement in the accident situation. Poor drivers cause a lot of scratched fenders, etc., chiefly through lack of parking know-how and ability to manoeuvre in close quarters.
