DOROTHY DIX SAYS—

tried to run our lives ever since we were married. They also try to raise my baby. I know it's partly our fault for letting them do it so long, but I didn't want to cause hurt feelings. Now my husband has been called to duty in California. He wants me to join him and I want to very much. As soon as my mother-in-law found out about it, she began to discourage me. They are willing for me to go, but not to take the baby. I believe in times like these families should be together. How can I tell them without hurting them?

MRS. H. ANSWER: You're a very wise girl for your age. For many reasons taking the baby and joining your husband will be the best thing for you. As you say, families should be together, even though the parting may hurt your fond in-laws for a time. Since you are such a young mother, they probably think you need help and guidance much more than you do. Their love for the baby is perfectly understandable, but his place is with you. Tell them that your husband wants both you and his son with him, and in view of the unsettled conditions of the world, you want to have every possible minute together. Assure them that you'll be back before too long, and will miss them greatly while you're gone.

You have so many fine qualities that I'm sure tact is among them. This is a situation that calls for plenty of it, and I'm sure you'll manage to leave home with no hurt feelings—or at least, no seriously hurt ones.

DEAR MISS DIX: For three months I have been going with a young man of 26, and we planned to marry this summer. We had been seeing each other almost every day until a month ago. Then he made a date, as usual, but never kept it. Since then I haven't heard from him. Should I call or write him, or wait?

MARY B. ANSWER: Since your relationship had gone as far as a formal engagement, you were certainly within your rights to call the day after he broke the date with you. He must have had some logical reason for not keeping it, and you are most assuredly entitled to an explanation. Better ask for it without further delay.

Miss Nilsen cannot reply personally to readers but will answer problems of general interest through this column.
