ELLEN'S DIARY

The Younger Generation Will Try "Anything Once"

On the rim of the valley, behind the woodlands and hilltops, the sunrise and sunset move now toward autumnal sites. . .Mack's white-marked red heifer's lowing by the pasture-gate begging admittance to the stable to attend there to her motherly duties, wakened us to the quiet gray which preceded the former this morning. And this evening, so nice a day it was, the sunset lit and flamed, and died to a coral afterglow beautifully above the quiet August hills. Beneath skies which forwarded well the work of their hearts today some farmers mowed and saved hay. Others in the community reaped harvest of grain setting their stooks in a pretty scene in orderly ranks along their stubbled fields. At Alderlea, our one patch of it assumes now a golden cast, catching the charm of sun and moon to hasten it on to its reaping.

In a new departure, and with that initiative of the young generation which "will try anything once" though we suspected the effort might be wasted, Jamie, eldest grandchild, brought the tractor and manure-lift to help at their wood-saving today. He loaded their little truck in a few turns of his machines and drove away from the heap by the maple-wood with a chuckle, while ours continued to hand-lift their sticks.

"I'm afraid the youngsters of this generation," James commented at supper "will lose the use of their limbs-they only use their hands to press a button or touch a lever now," he twinkled. "And who, I ask you, walks anymore? They ride if its only a distance of a few hundred yards. And their forbears walked miles," he reflected. "They walked in many an instance saving their horses for the weekday work, to Church if possible, to school, to the corner-store for groceries and mail. And how smart Ellen, the women could step it off to the missionary meeting in my mother's day! And now. . .but as I said, who walks any more? Times have changed since I was a lad."

"Yes, unbelievably," we agreed.

But if the machine age has changed - and will we suspect change - many a practice of the farm, still as some one points out "The farmer is regulated by nature. . .He is close to the universe. The shifting constellations, the tilting earth, the changing winds; these are the signs that tell the farmer it is the day for planting or the day for reaping or the day of curing and storing. His timepiece is of colossal proportion, a computer infinitely greater than any man-made contrivance."

"It worked," James nodded, "put on a load of sticks in no time." So Rob's and our woodsheds fill with the sun-baked sticks of the field-heaps. And filling, the names and faces of those for whom we shall boil our kettle and brew our cups of tea come to mind. And the coziness of the rooms we shall have when Winter stalks cold-robed along the resting farmlands.

Towards it we go steadily, as each August day slips away.

Until tomorrow — — —Diary—Good-night. . .
