"FUN," AND ITS CONSEQUENCE.

(Concluded.)

On entering the concert-room, Mrs. Winslow contrived by a dexterous movement to place Maria Templeton next to her husband; she came next herself, so that Fanny was as far as possible from her husband.

Not much of the performance did Mrs. Winslow hear, and the Missis Templeton, failing to discover the amiablity and agreeable manners they had heard so much of in Mrs. Winslow, had both voted her stupid and disagreeable.

On their return they found Mrs. Templeton's carriage waiting for the young ladies. As soon as they had departed, Mrs Winslow declared herself so tired that she should have to go to bed at once, instead of sitting, as usual, with her husband and discussing the events of the day while he smoked his cigar; and by pretending to be asleep when he followed her she prevented any attempts at conversation.

The next morning at breakfast her manner was so short and dry that Mr. Winslow said, 'I am very sorry, Annie, if I dissarranged your plans yesterday by bringing those two girls in unexpectedly; but the dinner was as nice as possible, and plenty of it.'

'If you think so, of course it is a matter of indifference to me,' replied Annie; they were not my friends.'

'But they were mine,' said her husband; 'and that, I suppose, comes to the same thing.'

'I know nothing of them,' said Mrs. Winslow; 'I never before saw but the youngest.'

'They are very nice girls,' continued Mr. Winslow. 'You would do well my dear to cultivate their acquaintance, and that of their mother. I cannot imagine what was the matter with you last night. I never saw you so unpleasant to any one. It made me very uncomfortable, for their father and mine were old friends, and I was glad of the opportunity of showing them a little civility.'

'You certainly have nothing to reproach yourself with on that score,' was the pettish reply. 'You took far more trouble for their amusement than you were disposed to take for mine.'

'What nonsense now have you got into your head? I beg this may be the last time of my ever hearing such folly from your lips,' exclaimed Mr. Winslow, rising from the table as he spoke.

Mrs. Winslow did not reply, but left the room, more than ever convinced that Miss Templeton, and not herself, was the object of her husband's regard, and resolving that going to waste her affection on one who did not return. Acting up to this worthy resolution, she accordingly persisted in treating him with the utmost indifference, ceased to ask him any questions, or to take any interest in any thing that concerned him, nevertheless, she was as scrupulously careful as ever in her domestic arrangements for his comfort, always spoke of him (when obliged to do so) with the same respect she had ever done, and thus flattered herself she was doing her duty in the most exemplary manner.

Meanwhile, John Winslow puzzled himself to discover the cause of his wife's alteration. He could not remember ever giving her cause for offence. He had never again troubled himself about the Templeton affair; such a trifle had not for a moment occurred to him as being in any way connected with it.

For a long time he tried to win his wife back by increased kindness; but finding every effort repulsed, he drew back into himself, and met her cold indifference with indifference equally cold. He shut himself in the library in the evening, and saw as little as possible of his wife. He had at last arrived at the conclusion that she did not care anything at all about him.

Thus passed a wretched twelve months. Mrs. Winslow avoided Miss Kennedy—the very sight of her was hateful; for she knew enough of her character to be sure that it was with no kindly intention she had revealed her husband's supposed faithlessness.

At length one morning, instead of going direct to the office, as usual, after breakfast, Mr. Winslow quietly requested his wife to follow him into his library. She was so astonished at the now novel request that she obeyed at once. Mr. Winslow carefully closed the door, and drew a chair for her.

'Mrs. Winslow,' he began, 'it is a long time since you condescended to take any interest in my affairs; but as I am about to make arrangements in which you are personally concerned, it will be necessary that you should be informed.'

Her face assumed its hard, indifferent expression, and she begged him to proceed.

'I have,' said he, 'been offered an important post abroad; and as many things combine to render it desirable, you will not be surprised to hear that I have accepted it. We have so long been virtually separated, that, foreseeing no trial to you, I did not think it necessary to trouble you by consulting you.'

Mrs. Winslow's face became very white and she said, half imploringly, 'I am quite ready to accompany you.'

'Certainly not,' was the decided reply. 'You have long ceased to render me your love. I desire no more to make demands on your duty and obedience. I shall make arrangements for your receiving an annual sum sufficient te keep you in every comfort. My brother will, I doubt not, receive my son, who will there be brought up to love and reverance his father. You will be permitted to see him occasionally, on one condition, that you never mention my name to him; and then, perhaps, when away from all old scenes, I may learn to forget the bright but fleeting happiness you shed over a short portion of my life, only to render it the more dark and gloomy.'

Mrs. Winslow sat like a statue while her husband was speaking. When he ceased she uttered a stifled cry, and, sinking down on the floor, she clasped her hands over her face, and moaned, 'Oh, why, why, did you marry me to break my heart with your crulty?'

'Say rather,' returned Mr. Winslow, 'why did you marry me to trifle with my happiness? I married you because I loved you, I believed you to be honest and sincere when you professed to return my affection. I can truly say that never from the hour I called you 'wife' have I ever had thought for my own happiness apart from yours. I have given you my best and purest affection. You were the first and and only woman I ever met that I cared to love or to seek for my wife.

At these words Mrs. Winslow suddenly looked up. She could not doubt the truth of what her husband said, and, in a moment, the folly of her conduct and the misery of its threatening consequences rushed upon her, and she flung herself on her knees before him.

'Oh, John, have pity, and pardon me!' she cried; 'I ought not to have believed but I thought—I was told'—

'What?' said John, in his sternest tone. 'But rise,' he added, 'this is no position for you.' He placed her in her chair as he spoke, and said, 'Now, tell me everything; first who told you?

Mrs. Winslow saw that her only chance was to obey, and she replied at once, 'Miss Kennedy.' and when?' he asked.

'It was the day of the concert last last year,' replied Annie; 'she called, and—' Here she paused.

'Go on,' said her husband; 'every word. What did she dare to tell you?'

Mrs. Winslow repeated to her husband what Miss Kennedy had told her, and what her hints implied.

With folded arms and flashing eyes he listened to the detail; and, when his wife concluded, said, 'And you believed her?' Now, hear my account: Mr. Templeton and my father were old friends; consequently, we younger ones were naturally thrown in each others society. I was not aware that the world would have ever coupled my name with that of Fanny Templeton. One thing I do know there never was any ground for it. She was and is a nice ladylike girl, with pleasing manners; but I never for a moment thought her in any other light. When Mr. Templeton died, his wife was much annoyed at the contents of the will, and, believing my father to have been the suggestor of its arrangement, she became very cool towards us, and I saw very little of any of them. The young people were always cordial as ever when I did meet them. You are perhaps, aware that she is a second wife, not their mother. I was therefore very glad to find an opportunity offer of doing them a slight service. I remember well that evening. Your inhositable manner, so unlike yourself, quite puzzled me at the time, though I never once thought of coupling it with your subsequent conduct. With regard to my hesitation on that morning, there was, I confess, a degree of selfishness about it, So dearly did I prize our quiet evenings together, I was loth to sacrifice one of them; and it was a feeling of duty to my father's memory alone that made me urge our hospitality on the Miss Templetons. Little did I think that the last of those happy evenings was already past.'

'Oh, John, do not say that!' exclaimed Mrs. Winslow; 'have pity and forgive. Oh, I implore you, do not leave me alone to die; 'I cannot live without you!'

Mrs. Winslow flung her arms wildly round her husband, as if to prevent his leaving her; but, before he could speak, the arms suddenly loosed their grasp, and the unhappy woman would have fallen to the ground if he had not caught her. The excitement had been more than her delicate frame could bear. Mr. Winslow carried her to the open window, bathed her brow with water that stood there for the purpose of watering a few favorite flowers, and as he loosened her dress to more freely admit the air, he was shocked to see how wasted and thin she had become.

'My poor darling,' he murmured, 'you have suffered as well as myself.'

Mrs. Winslow painfully and slowly recovered her consciousness; and her first words were a renewed entreaty for pardon.'

'Hush, dearest,' said her husband, 'we will both forgive and forget.

She once more closed her eyes, and remained perfectly quiet for a few minutes then suddenly rousing herself, she declared that she was quite well, and begged him to repeat his assurance of forgiveness.

'Most willingly do I forgive you, darling,' said he; 'and I reproach myself bitterly that I did not long ago ask for an explanation. We have both had a bitter punishment for our reserve. Let us now agree for the future to be perfectly open with each other; and whatever you may see or hear that you do not approve in me, let me entreat you to speak at once I will promise to do the same by you.'

A long kiss sealed the agreement, and then Mrs. Winslow said, 'but the appointment, John?'

'Oh, I shall tell Foster that I have reconsidered the matter, and cannot leave my wife,' he replied. 'I cannot take you and I cannot leave you.'

She hid her face in his bosom, and murmured her thanks.

'I must do it at once, though, Annie,' said he, gently raising her, 'for they will to fill up the vacant appointment. Now, lie quietly down here on the couch till I return, and then we will have a drive.'

Mr. Winslow kissed his wife and quitted the room. Annie burst into a flood of tears, half joyful, half repentant, and soon cried herself to sleep. Meanwhile, Mr. Winslow proceeded rapidly to Mr. Foster's gave in his resignation of the newly-accepted office, and then with a stern, determined brow, he knocked at Dr. Kennedy's door, and requested to see Miss Kennedy alone.

'I have called, Miss Kennedy, said he, 'it request you to explain the extraordinary account you thought proper to favor my wife with respecting myself and Miss Templeton.'

'What on earth do you mean? she exclaimed.

'It may, perhaps, assist your memory if I remind you that you called upon my wife one wet day in the March of last year,' said Mr. Winslow. There was to be a concert in the evening. It was then you made your false statement.'

'I believe I do remember something about some nonsense passing,' said Miss Kennedy.

'You will be so good as to inform me who was your authority for the slanders you then uttered,' continued Mr. Winslow, 'or (as I strongly believe to be the case) if you fabricated them yourself?'

'Really, Mr. Winslow, you are making a great fuss all about nothing!' exclaimed Miss Kennedy. 'At this distance of time I can't pretend to remember what I said. I do not know that anyone ever told me; I am sure whatever I said, I only did it for fun.'

'Fun, indeed!' said Mr. Winslow; 'I can well believe that you would esteem such lies 'fun'; but my wife is a truthful, delicate-minded woman, and it was no fun to her. I have only this morning discovered how deeply the canker had eaten into her happiness; a year's misery have you brought on us. Many, let me tell you, would have sought reparation from the law for their injuries. You are beneath such notice from me; I shall only charge my servants that for the future they deny you any admittance to my house; and let me warn you that the next time you indulge in 'fun,' that is any way connected with me or mine, the consequences to you may be somewhat more serious. For your father's sake, I am sorry to speak thus, but I cannot have my domestic happiness trifled with. I wish you good morning.'

Having said this, he departed, leaving Miss Kennedy to ruminate over his plain-spoken truths.

Years have passed since then. Mr. and Mrs. Winslow have not been without their share of trials, but never again has a single cloud of discord come between them to happiness. Miss Templeton is the cherished friend of both, and she often mentally reproaches herself for the hasty opinion she formed of Mrs Winslow onthe eventful evening of the concert.

Josh Billings might be supposed to have had General Butler in mind when he lately wrote: 'Perseverance always wins. I have known it to win in a hundred cases when it had never ought to.'

The Montreal Gazette calculates that the sugar crop of the year will be 300,000 tons less than usual, a circumstance which has especial interest for all householders, as for business people. It will be necessary, therefore, for the locks of pantries to be fitted with proper keys.

There is said to be a paper church actually near Berlin, which can contain nearly one thousand persons. It is circular within, octagonal without. The reliefs outside and statues within, the roof, ceiling, the Corinthian capitals, are all papier machie rendered waterproof by statuating in vitriol lime-water, whey, and white of eggs.

Of 526,632 persons who died in England in 1874, there were 69 who were 100 years old and upwards. Of this number 16 were men and 53 women. The oldest were six widows, each 104 years old. All the women but eight were widows, and one of them, 100 years old, was described as a ward in Chancery. Of the men only one is described as a gentleman.

'Is there an opening here for an intellectual writer?' said a very red-faced youth with the cork of a bottle sticking out of his breast pocket. The editor, with much dignity, took the young man's intellect in, and said: 'An opening? Yes, a kind and considerate carpenter, foreseeing your visit left an opening for you. Turn the knob to the right.'

CARDIGAN BRANCH

OF THE

NONPAREIL CARRIAGE FACTRY

AND AGRICULTURAL WORKS!

Good Work Triumphant!

NOTWITHSTANDING the Dull Times, the demand for my make of Carriages, Sleighs, Threshing Machines, Feaners, &c., in King's County, has rendered it necessary, in order to supply the rapidly increasing demand, that I should extend my business into that County. I have, therefore, at the request of a large number of my friends and patrons, opened a BRANCH FACTORY AT CARDIGAN BRIDGE, which is conducted by a competent mechanic, who served his time in the "Nonpareil," and has since worked for several years in the United States—a mechanic who knows his business, and has such an interest in the work as to allow nothing but a faithful job to pass. He and several competent workmen will attend to the wants of the public in that County.

The stock used in the construction of the work will be of the best imported, viz:—American Hickory, Oak, Ash, Elm, Bass, Whitewood, etc., etc. The iron will be of the best English refined; and Norway and Swedish iron will be used for the parts requiring extra strength and durability.

Also, in connection with the said branch is a PAINTSHOP, which is conducted by a first-class carriage-painter, who will attend to the painting of new and second-hand work for the public.

N B.—Persons wishing work done in the Carriage, Sleigh, or Farming Implement line, will please call and they will be treated courteously and fairly dealt with. All kinds of REPAIRING, including Mowing Machines, done. Prices Moderate; Terms Easy.
