The Rail

(Natural History notes contributed by the Pioneer Jack Miner League) A bird that is listed as moderately common in our land and yet is known to very few persons is the Rail. I was surprised, in conversation the other day, with a man who has passed the half-century mark, lived all his life near the haunts of game birds, is a fairly close student of nature, and yet he told me he never saw a rail.

Several other men who can identify a great many of our sparrows and small song birds, which is no easy task yet they tell the same story, they have never seen a rail. Doubtless they have seen him skulking across a mud pond but did not recognize him. Of all our birds, the rail perhaps is known as the greatest stalker of them all. He can hide in long grass and rushes with such ease that even a good dog can only flush him with difficulty. He is listed as a game bird, and is subject to practically the same open season as our ducks, geese and brant. As a game bird on P.E.I. He does not figure to any great extent. He is not a large bird, but is splendid eating, very much of the type of the Wilson snipe. Late in the autumn they are simply little balls of fat. Several varieties of rails are found in Canada, but the most likely one to be found here are the Sora, and the Virginia rail. The Sora is somewhat smaller than the Virginia and can be distinguished by its short conical bill. In fact the bird most frequently met with in our swamps here is the Sora.

Although the rail has no webbed feet, yet he often tries to swim when the water is too deep for wading, and he generally makes a success of it, in passing from one clump of grass or rushes to another, he often finds the water over his depth, so he half flies, half swims, until he reaches ground which will carry his weight. If you chance to sit at the edge of a swamp in the evening, you will hear all around you, something jumping in the water. Many times I have thought it to be a large frog, or else a trout, and even sometimes it sounded so heavy that it seemed it must be a muskrat, but on investigation, which is quite a difficult matter, I have seen the Rail scurrying through his runways in the long grass, and the reason for all those plunks in the water that seemed hard to account for were his attempts at swimming from one hummock to another. They are noisy birds, especially at night, and their loud cackling may often be heard although no bird is in sight. It is a very harmless bird, living on insect and vegetable matter found in our swamps, and on account of its small size, many think it should be protected at all times. So if you are a student of nature, and are in the vicinity of a large mud pond, or mill dam, just watch closely, and you will quite likely be able to see this interesting little bird of the swamps and bogs.

Reduced Fruit Yields Forecast

(C. P. By Guardian's Special Wire) OTTAWA, June 23.—The Dominion Bureau of Statistics today reported the fruit season was backward in all provinces and prospects were for reduced yields of most fruit crops.

While tree and small fruits came through the winter without injury in all Eastern Provinces with the exceptions of damage by mice and rabbits, chiefly in Ontario, considerable damage was done to trees in British Columbia by frost and severe weather in February. Sharp frosts during May were common in all Eastern Canada and damage in various amounts was caused in fruit bloom and early truck crops.

Vegetable crops promised large yields from increased acreages in Ontario and Quebec, with some reductions in British Columbia, while Manitoba and the Maritime Provinces showed little change in acreage.

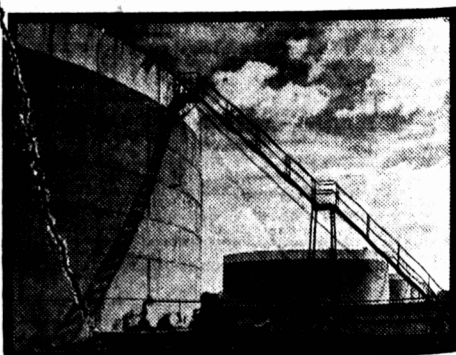

Field grown vegetables were now available in most parts of the country and early districts were in full production.

OIL ON SMOOTH WATERS... (Left) The world's largest tankship passing through the Panama Canal. She is owned by Imperial Oil interests and the best way to tell you how big she is to say if one of her cargoes of crude oil were loaded into railway tank cars, it would make a train 15 miles long.

IT'S A FARM! (Right)

—A tank farm in which crude oil and refined products are stored. The tanks you see in the picture hold 3,000,000 gallons each. The total capacity of Imperial Oil's tanks at Sarnia is 150,000,000 gallons — a necessary provision to protect consumers against scarcity.
