REBATE ON WOOL

The Canadian Co-operative Wool Growers' recently forwarded to the P.E.I. Sheep Breeders' Association well over $1,000.00 subsidy which amounts to 4c per pound on all wool sold through the Canadian Co-operative last year from Prince Edward Island patrons. This money will be distributed at the above rate to all patrons marketing wool in 1951 through the P.E.I. Sheep Breeders' Association on recognized grades. This payment is an evidence of the value of dealing through the Breeders' own Co-operative Organization. The extra amount realized on the sale of wool last year goes back to the wool owner. This has been the practise over the years in which the Co-operative has operated. What better argument could there be regarding the medium through which wool should be sold? Many of the patrons of the Co-operative last year received as high as $1.09 per pound for their wool. The Association is still open at the foot of Prince Street to receive your shipments.

SALAD WEEK

An important project conducted last year through the Canadian Horticultural Council was that of "Salad Week". This promotional scheme attracted a great deal of attention throughout Canada, and was very heartily endorsed by magazines of various kinds, and also supported by Hotel and Restaurant people, and private citizens. The objective is really based on health and involves an attempt to develop a greater demand for salads in the menu. Provincial Departments of Agriculture, Trade and Industry, Health and Welfare, Travel and Publicity, have all been advised about Salad Week for 1952, which is August 1st to 9th. No province in Canada lends itself more admirably to the preparation of delightful and tasty salads than does Prince Edward Island, and with our tasty vegetables, fruits, fish, and other materials, a great variety of appetizing salads should be available at all times at Hotels, Restaurants, and on our private tables.

In any event the attention of all our people is directed to this fine project developed under the auspices of the Canadian Horticultural Council. Information in this connection is available at the Department of Agriculture or the Women's Institute Branch, and bulletins will be forwarded to any parties desirous of receiving same.

Let us make Salad Week, August 1st to 9th, something that will remain with us through the medium of delightful and appetizing salads during the course of our lives.

Prevention Of Crippling

The cost of feeding pigs just weaned is not great, but it is very important that they are adequately and properly fed at this time. It is cheap insurance. Later on when they attain some size and age coarser and cheaper feeds may be fed more safely. The food provided for weaning pigs should be easily digestible and the following recommendations will serve as a guide in feeding and will prevent the occurrence of crippling.

The feed mixture should be low in hull or fibre. If common oats are used, they should be ground and sifted or put through a fanning mill to remove the hulls. If hull-less oats are available and ground they are most acceptable. Newly weaned pigs should be fed three times a day but do not overfeed them and the amount they get should be gauged by their appetites. There should not be any feed left in the trough by the time of the next feeding. Wherever skim milk or buttermilk is available it should be given to them because they are particularly valuable for the young growing pig. Care should be taken not to make abrupt changes from skim milk to sour milk or vice versa. If no milk product is available protein mineral supplement should be added to the grain mixture.

During winter, and even in other seasons, if the pigs are kept closely penned a standard feed oil of either type A or B containing 1,000 units of Vitamin A and 200 units of Vitamin D should be added to the feed once a day. This is to safeguard against crippling.

At any time when changes of feed mixtures are contemplated, it should be done gradually rather than abruptly. This should be done to avoid digestive disturbances which sometimes follow quick changes in the diet.

Women's Work

During the past two days Women's Institute district conventions in Kings and Queens counties have been held. Practically all of these conventions had record attendances, many in spite of poor weather. A smaller attendance was expected this year because of the lateness of the season. The planning behind these conventions shows evidence of hard work and a great deal of thought. Three years of leadership training courses have done much to improve afternoon programs in many districts. It is hoped that eventually all district officers will take advantage of this course.

The conventions this year are the panel discussions on Education which were held at Centre Queens No. 2 and West Queens. These two conventions plan to continue this feature in future. Many conventions have held sewing competitions, among these were little girls dresses and aprons at several conventions and North Shore No. 2 showed boudoir dolls. Interesting displays of antiques with stories attached were shown at Centre Kings and West Queens conventions. Districts with such excellent material already prepared would have little difficulty in writing community histories for the Tweedsmuir Competition. At Centre Queens No. 1 two splendid demonstrations were held namely Island Industries and party table decorations. At North Shore No. 2 demonstrations on the home manufacture of butter, hand weaving, and adult sewing class work were shown. East Kings, Centre Kings No. 2, South Centre Kings and North Shore No. 2 had excellent displays of 4-H Club work.

Many districts are finding that refreshments served in buffet style are easier to prepare and manage when large crowds are in attendance.

We And Our Neighbours

by Ruhamah Scheinfeld Frank

In the mysterious way that such news gets about, within ten minutes of his arrival, everyone in the organization had been warned that the Boss was on the war-path! The various employees reacted in different ways. Miss Jones, pretty and admired, tossed a gay, "So what?" over her shoulder. Mr. Turner, ready to retire to his farm, laughed, "Too bad." Young Jackson, breezy and self-confident, grinned, "Oh, Yeah, I can hardly wait to hear him speak his little piece."

But there were a few uneasy, insecure individuals (there usually are in any organization) to whom the Boss's moods were very important. Of these, John Gray was most disturbed. He felt himself shrinking in fear, just as he did years ago when his mother cautioned, "Be careful. Play quietly. Your father is upset."

John Gray had gotten along all right until the firm changed hands. John was harassed at the office. "What makes Mr. Benson act that way?" she asked herself. "He is said to be a good citizen and a friendly neighbour. Doesn't he feel that those in his employ are neighbours too?" "But no," she concluded, as John came up the stairs, wearily, like an old man. "Mr. Benson believes that everyone can do anything if he tries hard enough, and that pushing and prodding and sarcasm will force the lazy ones to work better. He actually thinks he is doing them good."

John greeted her and Tommy, their five year old son, quite pleasantly. Consciously, he believed himself a considerable husband and father who shed the day's worries when he entered his home, and didn't burden his wife with his troubles. But he spoke little and Mary knew that some small incident would bring to a head his growing sense of bitterness and failure. And it happened at the dinner table. Tommy reached for the milk pitcher while his glass was still half-full, and overturned it. Some of the milk fell on John's trousers. Shouting in wrath, he upbraided the child for his bad manners and carelessness, and then "displaced" upon his wife as well, all the venom and anger he felt but did not dare express toward the boss. What did she do all day he wanted to know. If she didn't even teach her son to be useful, how could she expect him to be? Tommy, hurt and frightened and crying convulsively, was put to sleep by his mother.

Later, when John and Mary dreams too, were beginning to interfere with his work; the other mechanism was destroying his home life. Often after a rebuke from Mr. Benson, outwardly meek, he would imagine himself inventing "something" that would make him rich and famous. His ledger forgotten, he would gloat over how he would then humiliate the boss.

This day Mr. Benson was suddenly called away and the office relaxed. No one felt the loyalty inspired by Mr. Peters and no one did more than he absolutely had to. Indeed, some found sly methods of getting even with Mr. Benson. The hours of suspense, however, had their effect on John, and his wife, Mary, watching anxiously from the window, could see that it had been another bad day. "If only," she brooded, "John would stop at the 'Y' or one of the other men's clubs, for a swim, a game of hand-ball or tennis, to get rid of some of his feelings of resentment and worry." She had heard wives complain that the dinner got cold; there are modern ways to keep it warm, but what can keep harmony in a home, she thought, when it is fast disappearing?

If only John would confide in her. He had never told her but she knew through a friend whose husband also worked for the firm, how John was harassed at the office. "What makes Mr. Benson act that way?" she asked herself. "He is said to be a good citizen and a friendly neighbour. Doesn't he feel that those in his employ are neighbours too?" "But no," she concluded, as John came up the stairs, wearily, like an old man. went to bed, they lay silently apart from each other. John fell asleep first. Sleep too was an escape. But Mary tossed about for hours. In some way, she thought, she must help John to realize he could find another job. Mr. Peters had understood and valued John. There must be other people who could use his fine qualities. Perhaps she could lead John to talk things over with the minister. Or that elderly lawyer he liked so much. Or perhaps, most wonderful of all, she herself could break through the defenses built by him in his unhappy childhood, and together they would work things out.
