Special Process Peas Developed

Canned peas with the natural green color of fresh peas have been sought by the canning industry for many years.

Now, canned peas as fresh green as the day they were picked are available to the table-proud housewife through a special process exclusive with Canadian Canners Ltd., makers of Aylmer Special Process Peas.

After intensive research, tumble from the can a rich, succulent green with all the color and eye-appeal of garden-fresh peas.

In the Aylmer special process, peas are sorted and rinsed with hot water. There follows a short, high temperature "pressure cook" after which comes immediate cooling.

Storage temperatures for the special peas are carefully controlled thereafter, to ensure that the peas develop a sweet tenderness, and retain their fresh greenness. The consumer, by the way, is advised to store the Aylmer Special Process Peas in a cool place. Kept at a temperature no higher than 55 degrees, the peas will last in every way.

To help the housewife use special process peas to best advantage, the following recipes have been prepared by Canadian Canners.

Back Yard Is Preferred To Big Front Lawn

CALGARY (CP) — Natalie Chapman, one of the few women landscape designers in Canada, prefers a comfortable back yard to the impressive front lawn.

"It's the back garden that the family is going to use," says Miss Chapman, whose green thumb and practised eye were developed from childhood by her father, who was in the landscaping business for 30 years.

She says the back yard must be suited to the individual family to be put to its fullest use. It should be divided into work and play areas. Shrubs and trees should be tailored for the family.

"A family with small boys should always have willow trees," she says. "Boys love to climb trees and the laurel leaf willow... has strong spreading branches."

"Not only that, it's a quick-growing hardy tree with an exceptionally pretty leaf."

Her biggest problem is people who want to raise oranges, palm trees, maples or other growths not suited to the Southern Alberta climate.

"We have a limited range of plants," she explains. "People from Vancouver or the East simply can't believe plants they were fond of at home won't survive here."

Chinooks — the mild winds that blow over Alberta at times from the pacific — are to blame for this belief, she says.

"They really play havoc with a garden. Last February during a chinook, all the tulips started to bloom and the shrubs to sprout when they had no business doing so."

Shrub-lovers also must be convinced that some favored growing methods are impractical because of the climate.

"I can't get people to stop watering their plants between Sept. 1 and freeze-up," she says. "If they water them after Sept. 1, sap is collected at the top of the plant and freezes there. After a good solid frost, the sap will go to the bottom of the plant and water will form a block of ice to keep it there."

Miss Chapman, her mother and father all represent a Saskatchewan nursery. Their work begins in the winter when they visit homes to arrange orders for plants and sketch layouts for gardens.

Miss Chapman says Calgarians could grow a much greater variety than they do. Besides poplars and birch which flourish in the city now, crab apple, plum, cherry and apple trees as well as gooseberries, rhubarb and raspberries could be raised.

"Besides helping the family budget," she says, "they would supply just about everything except the citrus fruits. And you can buy 50 raspberry bushes for the price of one case of raspberries."
