ELLEN'S DIARY

A Sheep-Storm Finale Follows Pleasant Week

"Yes, this is the sheep-storm," James commented this morning, when a June wind continued to blow cool rainfall along our valley.

"It's come earlier this year," we said.

"It's a good thing the ewes are not shorn, Ellen, and that they and the lambs have shelter."

Rain and a cool wind. They carried the scent of damp lilac bloom up to our door.

"Oh dear," Peter sighed coming by at mid-morning. "I don't like a rainy day. Tell you though what we could do" he offered brightening. "We could go over to the stables to see the kittens. And I could show you where the little bantam sits. She made herself the cutest nest in a manger! At bedtime the others come there to roost on the water-pipe above. I guess that is so she won't be lonesome in the dark. And that would be a help to her, wouldn't it?" He smiled to think of it.

On the lawn, there where the narcissi bowed damp waxen heads, a robin tugged at an earthworm.

"She is getting her cupboard filled for over Sunday," we chuckled to Peter. "She must be a good housewife" we said.

Those items of the days past we chose to remember, threading them as so many pearls on memory's cord, come to mind together make up our day, our life and our living: a young laugh floating back from little lads homing with the dusk on their shoulders, toward their day's end; a farmer calling home the cows at the nursing time from the (rented) pasture on the far side of the stream, the echo lingering, as with pleased lows, the animals respond to his voice; Scampie, the dog, anxious over the great that had intruded into our quiet; mother-cats and kittens; lilacs-bless them! Sunrise and sunsets; flitting juncos, and thrushes' notes; butterflies, and fresh-baked loaves; steps and faces we love. Excursions, in fancy on foot, and in fact though more or less rarely, by machine: pastorals and seascapes. . . and the wish as always that the season which ushers in the summer could linger, so pleasant it is.

Pleasant this week with the sheep-storm as its grand finale. It came only to return former members? of June gone before. Because invariably there has been a June storm of wind and rain. It usually comes down on the shorn flock that huddling together seek shelter. . . Today we saw Mack inspect and feel the edge of a new pair of shears. At the farmers' convenience, when a seal has been set to the affairs of the cropping, and past this spell of cool weather, our shearing will come. It will be done in a pen up at the other farm, where now the old

Designer's Junk Jewellery Is Traffic-Stopper

VANCOUVER (CP)—It's not often anybody can get excited about junk. But that's what Ida Thery has done, and with considerable success.

Miss Thery, a Vancouver dress and hat designer, has created what a fashion editor has called "a collection of fabulous fake jewellery" out of odds and ends she had lying about.

The designer calls the jewelry pure primitive—"sculptures in papier mache." Earrings come out light as a feather, large and in exotic colors as well as black and white.

"I just looked around at all the bits and pieces I'd been saving for years and decided to do something about it," says Miss Thery.

The reasonably-priced jewelry is featured at a boutique in suburban Oakridge and has been a real traffic-stopper.

Miss Thery, who used to design all the hats for Vancouver's Theatre Under The Stars and often appears on television, is already looking ahead to fall. She has some ideas of using the bits and pieces of tweed and leather she has in her apartment.

And at the moment she is turning out a mad collection of sun hats for the same boutique. Her junk jewelry is considered right for hostess wear and rest clothes.

Home For Girls Of Teen Age Proves Success

PRINCE GEORGE, B.C. (CP) A home for teen-age girls who can't get along with their parents or have no home of their own is proving a success after a year of operation.

"It is not a home for unwed mothers, although a girl who became pregnant would not be turned out any more than she would be turned out of a family home," says house mother Carla Reed.

"It is not a prison or a de- and the girls obey the same sort of rules that would be imposed in any home with youngsters this age."

The girls range in age from
