'Rebel' M. D.'s Seek Hospital Despite Bevan

KINGSTON - ON - THAMES, England, May 29 (Reuters)—A handful of "rebel" doctors who in 1950 revolted against socialized medicine, plan to open their own hospital independent of the state-run health service.

The 24 doctors have announced they have raised about £4,500 in 10 months and are searching for a large house in pleasant surroundings to convert into a 30-bed hospital.

They made news in 1950 by defying Aneurin Bevan, the then Labor government health minister, who wanted to turn the 44-bed Kingston and Malden Victoria Hospital into a state-run maternity unit.

Eviction notices were received after 18-months' negotiations but the doctors—all general practitioners—staged a six-month stay-in-strike and continued to treat patients after the hospital officials did not exist.

When they were finally defeated, the defiant doctors did not quietly return to their own private practices. "We may be dead but we're not lying down," their enthusiastic young leader, Dr. Bernard Lake, warned the health minister. The rebels formed the Kingston and Malden Medical Foundation and appealed for funds for a new hospital.

Treatment in the new hospital will be free, as under the National Health Plan, but the hospital will be dependent on voluntary contributions.

Their former hospital was run on voluntary contributions. The £11,000 remaining in the bank when the doctors finally lost their battle was taken over by the Government health service for general use.

The doctors treated hospital patients in addition to outside work and because it had no resident staff the hospital was known as one of the new English "cottage hospitals."

About 900 patients used its beds every year at an average cost of £12 a week each.

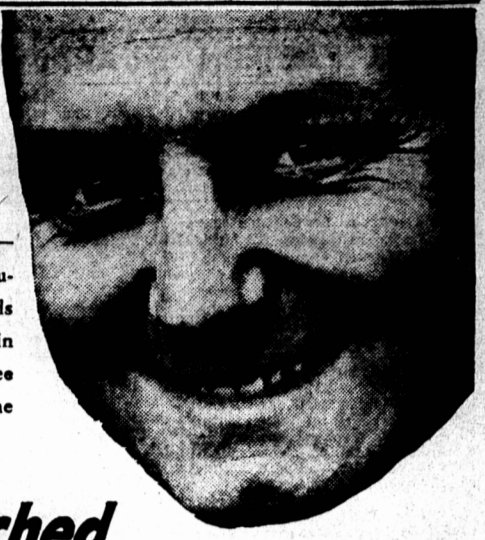

Money and gifts are still being received for the new hospital.
