Slow Boat From Marseilles By Michael Hastings (Continued from Page 11)

Lacoste seemed about to say more; but changed his mind. With a curt nod, he turned away.

Oliver returned to the deck and was able to intercept the negro, who was about to leave.

"What is your name?" he asked "They jus', calls me 'Jim Crow, suh."

"I want the glass-work of the bridge cleaned. If anybody wants you for anything else, send them to me."

The negro hesitated. Then he showed his teeth in a pearly smile. "Yes, suh," he said.

At this moment Dr. Prinz came on board. He carried himself more stiffly than usual, and his face was clear indication of his temper.

But when he saw Oliver he made an effort to appear pleasant.

"I'm glad to see you here," he said.

"I've just stowed my kit, doctor. I've had a look round—and now I'm trying to get things tidied up a bit."

"Excellent," Prinz said. "It could do with it. The crew are idle and Zaksas... He shrugged his shoulders and left the sentence unfinished.
