THE RUDE AWAKENING

Let not fright your judgment sway; You can seldom win that way. — Honker the Goose.

It was the night of the first day of the great adventure for Honker the Goose and his flock. That morning they had left their nesting grounds in the Far North and started on the long, long journey to the Sunny South to spend the winter. That journey always is a great adventure. So is the return journey in the spring. It is just so with all feathered folk who go to the Sunny South to get away from Jack Frost.

UNUSUAL OPPORTUNITY

An opportunity for a very unusual bid was present in the following deal:

West dealer. Both sides vulnerable. North-South 40 on score.

♠ 9 6 5 3 2	N	10 7 4
♥ A Q 7 5	W	9 6 3 2
♦ A 4 3	E	Q 10 5 2
♣ J 10 2	S	6 4

♠ A 3
 ♥ 9 7 6
 ♦ A K Q 9 8 5

The mutual vulnerability and the North-South part-score naturally influenced the bidding, which was as follows:

The bidding:

West	North	East	South
1NT	Pass	Pass	4♣
Pass	Pass	Pass	Pass

South had two reasons for jumping to three clubs: (1) his side needed 30 points for game; and (2) if he either doubled one no-trump or overcalled with two clubs, West might be able to name a suit that would "hit" his partner.

This was not bad reasoning on South's part, but, unfortunately, he went down one at his three-club contract. West opened the club jack, and South's only real play for nine tricks was to find both the ace and queen of diamonds in front of dummy's K-J-8. Since this condition did not exist, South had to lose one spade, two hearts and two diamonds.

Although it has already been conceded that South's reasoning was "not bad," it is worth observing that a different tactic would have brought full success. South might have bid two no-trump! Granted, it is usually illogical to make this call against an opposing no-trump, because, in almost all circumstances, it is far more profitable to double the one no-trump! In this case, however, with the score what it was and with South's hand consisting to such a large extent of a long and (probably) solid suit, it would have been a shrewd decision to play for eight tricks at no-trump rather than nine tricks at clubs. South could not double one no-trump as safely, because North's opening lead might give West quite a few tricks.

small lake deep in the Green Forest in mid-afternoon and there they had rested and fed and gabbled happily until with the coming of the Black Shadows they had become sleepy. Then while they were making ready for the night, someone had come splashing along at the water's edge and the young Geese had huddled together in fright. Never had they dreamed that there could be such a big person, such a giant, anywhere in all the Great World. It was Flatthorns the Moose. For a while they were no longer sleepy. They were too frightened to be sleepy. It was only when they saw that Honker and Mrs. Honker were not afraid, but swam in near Flatthorns and talked with him as with an old friend that they dared swim in a little nearer and stare most impudently at the great stranger. In the gathering dusk it looked as if he had a young spreading tree growing on his head. Never before had they seen any one with antlers or horns.

But they were tired. They grew sleepy again. They lost interest in this giant eating lily roots and seeming so harmless. Father and Mother were not afraid, so why should they be? Then Flatthorns left. They didn't see him go. They didn't hear him go. One instant he was a blacker shadow among the Black Shadows. The next instant he wasn't there. So he must have gone away. "How could he and we not hear him? There is nothing the matter with my ears," said one young Goose.

"Perhaps he is lying down and that is why we cannot see him," said another. "How could any one so big lie down and we not hear him do it?" a third wanted to know. "Time you youngsters were asleep. We'll have a long flight tomorrow," said Honker as he and Mrs. Honker joined them. "Where is he?" chorused several together. "Who?" asked Honker, pretending he didn't know whom they meant. "That giant you called Flatthorns," said one. "He has gone away. I don't know where he has gone. It is no business of mine so I don't care," replied Honker. He yawned. "But he is so big! He couldn't have gone and we not have heard him. No one as big as he is could move about and not snap so much as a single twig," protested another.

But he did. Now it is high time you youngsters were asleep," spoke up Mrs. Honker. It was high time, and it wasn't long before all were asleep excepting Honker. He was on guard. Later another would take his place. It was very still. The shore was just a black mass of deeper blackness. Overhead the stars twinkled with a sort of frosty brightness, for the night was cold. The flock slept peacefully, the young Geese too tired to even dream. They were awakened by a strange and frightful sound that caused their eyes to open wide with fear. They shivered and shook as they huddled together as close to the elders as they could get. What was it? What had given them such a rude awakening?
