These lines, if crude and undefined,
From empty compliments are free,
A simple wreath of verse entwined
By one who loves and honors thee.

Hon. Mr. Laird observed that the system of Departmental Government was almost gone. The bill only provided for the heads of two departments in the Executive Council.

As to abolishing the office of Solicitor General, it would be no saving to the country. The present Solicitor General was anxious to have the office abolished.

The fees for extra work would amount to more than the salary would be if the office were retained. Besides the Attorney General and Solicitor General, the Government had sometimes to employ professional men.

The Attorney General was an overworked man. His correspondence with magistrates and others was very voluminous. The fees of the Solicitor General, at the rate charged by professional men, would be double what the Government was paying him.

Hon. Mr. Laird said that as he had not the privilege of replying to his honor the Leader of the Government while the President was in the chair, he would now say a few words after due notice had been asked the Leader of the Government if he would lay upon the table the correspondence between the Minister of Justice and the Attorney General respecting the extension of criminal law to this Island.

On the 12th of April, his honor laid the correspondence upon the table, and he (Mr. Laird) observing that it was dated 1874, asked if there was no later correspondence. His honor the Leader of the Government replied that there was not.

Subsequently he learned from members of the Dominion Parliament who had returned to the Island, that the Attorney General, on behalf of the Government, had asked for further time to consider the matter. Was it possible that this application for further time could have been made after the 12th of April, instant, and that the correspondence had been returned from Ottawa?

Hon. Mr. Strong said the Attorney General had told him (Mr. Strong) that there was no other correspondence. He (Atty. Gen.) was present in this House, and his honor the Leader of the Opposition were to ask him the same question, he would receive the same answer.

Hon. Mr. Laird said that, of course his honor did not guarantee the correctness of the Attorney General's statement; but looking at the dates and considering the circumstances of the case, his honor must admit that he [Mr. L.] had reason to suspect that the whole correspondence was not produced.

Hon. Mr. Strong said that the whole of the correspondence was produced up to the time when his honor the Leader of the Government said there was no other correspondence, or the Attorney General who said there was not? Did his honor want him or the Attorney General to manufacture correspondence?

A TERRIBLE DOMESTIC TRAGEDY.

From the New York Sun.

In a bright, brick four-story tenement in Montross, near Northmouth Street, Jersey City, lived Thomas McGrath, a leek head and the Jersey City ferry, his wife Bridget and eight children of the husband by a former wife. McGrath was a very industrious, and peaceable man.

On Thursday night McGrath found a bare table and nothing in the house to eat. The eldest girl said that her step-mother was drunk. He proceeded to get himself and the little ones. Late at night Mrs. McGrath returned intoxicated, and her husband expostulated with her, and she answered him insolently.

He quitted the house and returned shortly after midnight. His wife was lying in bed, and he went to put his honorably to rest. He found her sitting up in bed, and she told him that she had been talking to the woman and she promised to reform. Shortly before midnight their quarrels were renewed, and the husband, who was not passed through the sitting room to the bedroom to retire. He had a lighted lamp in his hand. McGrath with a stick smashed the lamp into fragments.

He struggled, and then grasping a carbide that hung under the mirror, she brought it down with terrible force on his head. He fought desperately, however, and gained possession of the carbide. They struggled blindly with blood, to the window. The room was in some darkness. Then a shriek was heard, and the husband went reeling from the fourth story window to the pavement beneath. The wife sank exhausted by the window, her night dress saturated with blood, and there she was found by neighbors at one o'clock yesterday morning.

McGrath was taken by the police to St. Francis Hospital, and there he died. Mrs. McGrath soon followed her husband to the hospital. Her flesh was lacerated in several places, her wrist broken, and her scalp cut. She complains of severe internal injuries, and it is feared she may die.

Ex-Queen Isabella met with a rather cool reception on her recent return to Spain, according to the accounts received by foreign journals. The queen, accompanied by the Princess of Asturias, arrived at Santander to receive her mother, and when the vessel which brought the Queen home in sight all the church bells were set ringing, and the guns thundered their official welcome.

The band played the Royal March and the King started out to meet his mother, amid the enthusiastic acclamations of the naval and military elements. The road was densely crowded and although few views were to be heard, it was easy to see that the young monarch was in the bottom of Pandora's box, and he hopes plumes her wings anew, since the issuing of these valuable works, published by the Peabody Medical Institute, which are teaching thousands how to avoid the maladies that sap the vitality of life.
