Charges Warsaw's Palace Of Culture Scene Of Wild Orgies

WARSAW, Poland (Reuters) — A Warsaw newspaper Friday pictured the huge Russian-built palace of culture here as the scene of wild drinking and sex orgies by young comrades. The story of the "nightlife of the palace of culture" in the newspaper Glos Pracy says the lounges, theatres and bathrooms are breeding grounds for hooligan parties. An army of Russian workmen constructed the 30-storey palace between 1952 and 1955 as a gift to Poland from the Soviet Union. It was formerly known as the "Joseph Stalin palace of culture and science." Delving through 310 pages of palace records, a reporter for Glos Pracy says he has uncovered these accounts of scenes: "The calm of a television show in the palace's public television hall was suddenly broken by a woman's cry of 'lights on.' When the lights flashed on the audience saw a half-naked girl struggling with two youths in a corner. "Night watchmen passing through the warm, soft-carpeted corridors in the upper part of the palace surprised a couple under the influence of drink behaving immorally. The youth started a quarrel. "In a marbled exhibition hall, a 13-year-old girl was writing a rude phrase on the wall with her lipstick. She did not realize two ushers were standing behind her. Her mother was called and reprimanded the girl for having admitted that she was to blame." Hooligans "completely devastated toilets" and removed everything portable. They used the washrooms for selling vodka and speculating in theatre tickets. Empty vodka bottles were littered all over the "cozy nooks" of the palace. Most offenders—the newspaper says—"the list of those detained is very long"—have been teenage pupils of evening technical schools.

Tommycod Fishing Washed Out; Weather Is Blamed

STE. ANNE DE LA PERADE, Que. (CP)—Microgadus Tomycod has missed out on a lot of luscious liver this season. But then the fishermen who dangle the liver—on little barbed hooks—have missed out, too. They haven't been catching of Microgadus Tomycod, alias Petit Poisson des Chenaux, alias Tommycod. Everything is blamed on the weather, as usual. Back at Christmas time, it turned mild, and the ice on the frozen Ste. Anne River melted away. With the ice went the hopes of the villagers of hooking lots of tommycod during its annual battle under the ice up the Ste. Anne to spawn. The winter sport of fishing through the ice here goes back centuries. But lately it's multiplied in popularity like the tommycod in spawning season. HOLIDAY BOOM In past years, folks came from far and wide to rent heated cabs on the ice. A holiday atmosphere engulfed this village with a 290-year history, 105 miles northeast of Montreal. Everyone was happy but ol' Microgadus Tomycod on a frying pan. When the ice melted in the sudden pre-Christmas thaw, villagers made a mad scramble to rescue their huts. The shacks earn a fair pot of money when rented and the children use them as play-houses in the summer. As it was, some residents weren't fast enough, and at least six shelters floated down the river into the St. Lawrence like ocean-going outhouses. With cold weather around again, everyone hopes the ice will freeze fast and hard enough during the weekend to permit the rescued shacks to be hauled back out to their places Monday. SOME DOUBTS Some, while optimistic about the ice, are doubtful about the tommycod. This mysterious fish, about eight or nine inches long, makes its biggest run around Christmas and New Year's, and the doubting Isaac Waltons fear most of the tiny fish have already shot up the river. The scientific name of the fish is microgadus tomcod, but it is known under a variety of other names, including Atlantic tomcod and frostfish. No one is sure where the tommycod comes from and fewer know where it goes. But more and more people have learned that the tommycod swims past here—and as soon as the ice is firmly back they'll be out with the liver to waylay a painful of fish for the frying pan.

British Labor Party Faction Want Bolder Foreign Policy

LONDON (Reuters)—An angry group of Labor party left-wingers Friday launched a drive for a bolder Socialist foreign policy. In the weekly publication, Tribune, they called upon Labor party leader Hugh Gaitskell to "speak boldly and with angry impatience." Among those in the aroused group is Tribune Editor Michael Foot, Ian Mikardo and Fenner Brockway. The faction is comparable in some ways to the old "Bevanites" who created a deep rift in the party three years ago. But Aneurin Bevan, chief Labor spokesman on foreign affairs, is completely detached from the new group. Some moderate elements have been attracted to the group. They fear the Conservatives' foreign policy is leading Britain into a dangerous path. These moderates feel along with the left-wingers that the Labor party must develop more positive policies and more effective opposition. The Tribune declared that the party rank and file is demanding "a rip-roaring campaign to explain the fundamental clash now dividing the parties on foreign affairs." It commended Gaitskell's recent statement in favor of a summit meeting, but criticized him for saying that foreign ministers must carefully prepare in advance for such a conference. GAITSKELL "NO CLERK" "Mr. Gaitskell is not a foreign

Hammarskjold Gives Views On Middle East

UNITED NATIONS N.Y. (AP)—Secretary-General Dag Hammarskjold said Thursday there exists in the Middle East a desire to achieve "a balance which would provide for peace with justice and fairness in all directions." He made the comment at his first press conference at United Nations headquarters since his return from a trip to the Middle East. He conferred Wednesday with State Secretary Dulles on the Middle East and disarmament. As to prospects for new steps aimed at breaking the disarmament deadlock, Hammarskjold said it is "too early to add anything to the picture." He cautioned patience during the present period, which he described as a time of groping on the East-West diplomatic scene. His comments on the Middle East came in response to a query on the anti-Western tone taken at the Asian-African people's conference in Cairo.
