Jackson, took charge of the devotional period which was in the form of a "dedication service" in which the beautiful oil burner recently installed in the church was dedicated to the service of the Lord.

The topic was "The Power of the Word" and "The Power of the Prayer". The secretary, Mrs. Russell Moore, took charge of the business. Special dedication prayers were given by Mrs. Ernest Griffin and the president.

The meeting closed with The Queen and a delicious luncheon was served by the hostess.

of the entries in the three lowest classes. In the test for length the Island had two hogs getting a score of 20, two more 19, three 17 and one 16. Ontario had eight in the five top scores from 16 to 20, but the rest rated all the way down to only 7. Manitoba had one with a score of 20 and Saskatchewan had two.

When it came to the back fat test none of the 46 hogs scored 20 but there were eight in the next four highest scores with this Province placing one in each class. Many of the hogs tested for this rated very low with one having no score at all and 19 others scoring less than 10.

The summary for loin score showed the local type with one scoring 20, three 18, three 17 and one 16. Ontario with its 19 entries was the only other Province to place eight hogs in the first five scoring classes, but it also had six rating from there to 12 and five more at 10 or under.

Quebec had one animal scoring 16, but the other eight ranged from that point down to as low as 8. These various scores and summaries which indicate conclusively the general superiority of the type of bacon hog produced in Prince Edward Island, coupled with freedom from the dread hog cholera, are providing a genuine boost to the morale of breeders who some months ago were inclined to be pessimistic over the outlook.

prisoners, minor differences might drag out the talks for days and even weeks.

With Grain of Salt Many UN soldiers on the fighting front took the latest news with a grain of salt, pointing to past reports of near agreement.

Canadian troops serving in the Commonwealth division were generally pessimistic. Red frontline loudspeakers barked at the Allies: "Armistice will be signed in a few days. Don't expose yourselves to our mortar fire."

South Korean government officials, angry at the turn the talks have taken, said the apparently impending settlement was on terms objectionable to them but they had no choice but to go along. They want no truce that leaves Korea divided.

Today's truce session followed a one-day recess asked by the Allies while UN policy-makers studied a counterproposal the Reds submitted Thursday on the prisoner issue. But even before the meeting convened, reports were widespread in Washington, London, Tokyo and Seoul that the Communist offer virtually amounted to acceptance of the Allies' May 25 compromise plan except for minor objections.

Rhee Still Opposed President Syngman Rhee announced after an hour's conference with Gen. Mark Clark, UN commander in the Far East, that South Korea would sign the present truce proposal. But he said the United States "is forcing us to".

To the end, Rhee has argued that South Korea could not accept of its own volition a truce that would leave it divided and would permit Chinese Red troops to remain on Korean soil.

The war already has cost the Allies more than 406,000 casualties and the Reds close to 1,900,000. A truce would release from captivity some 13,000 Allies and about 83,000 Reds who want to return home. The 48,500 North Korean and Chinese Reds unwilling to go back would be handled under a formula still being worked out in the current debate.

Probable Plan Although the Allied May 25 compromise plan and the Red June 4 counter-proposal neither have been made public, the formula being worked out for handling prisoners is reported to provide:

- 1. Exchange within 60 days of those wanting to go home.
2. Assignment to custody of a five-member "neutral" commission—Czechoslovakia, Poland, Sweden, India and Switzerland—of the 48,500 North Korean and Chinese prisoners refusing repatriation.

3. A custodial period of 120 days during which the Communist representatives could "explain" to the prisoners why they should go home. Differences remain over the duration of the custodial period and the number of men the Reds can send in for the explanations.

4. Reference to the prisoners still refusing to go home to a post-armistice political conference; differences still remain over the duration of such a conference.

restored to good health in the very near future. Mr. Murdock MacDonald motored to Montague on a recent afternoon to visit his brother, Mr. John MacDonald, who is a patient in Memorial Hospital.

The President, Mrs. Leland Nelson, presided. The meeting opened with the hymn "O God Our Help in Ages Past". The Scripture lesson was read by Mrs. Claude Nicholson, followed by the Lord's Prayer in unison. Roll call was answered by 14 members and there were four visitors present.

The minutes of the previous meeting were read by the secretary, Mrs. Wellington Campbell, and were approved as read. There was no report from the sick committee.

Following the routine business the meeting closed with the Mix-pah Benediction and a social evening was enjoyed, featuring a sale of articles. Mrs. Nelson and Miss Theilma Larver acted as auctioneers.

A sing-song, with Mrs. George Gordon as organ accompanist, was enjoyed by all. A delicious lunch was served by the hostess assisted by Mrs. Albert Fraser, Mrs. Nelson and Miss Mary Hemphill.

CHAPTER XVIII

Thurlow woke late after a restless night and lay for some little while thinking over the previous evening's events and wondering what his next move should be.

He was definitely committed now to the course which he had viewed with such dubiety only the previous afternoon — and, upon the whole, he was not sorry. It meant, among other things, that he was jeopardizing a future which might have been regarded as tolerably safe had he chosen the alternative, but when he thought of all that alternative implied, he could not bring himself to regret his action.

To have to acquiesce in a system of government which left all the real power in the trader's hands would have been bad enough in itself, in view of the use he was making of it; but to lend himself to such a barbarous travesty of justice as that which Strang had advocated was something infinitely worse.

But though he felt no real regret at the decision he had taken, he recognized that he was only at the beginning of a struggle in a set-back Strang had received, he still held the machinery of power in his grasp — and the whole economic life of the island was bound up in that machinery.

In the connection he had the uneasy feeling that he had not made the best use of the situation which had risen the night before. The popular demonstration which had followed his acquittal of Losaki had taken him completely by surprise, and at the time he had only thought of getting the excited men away before they started to do any mischief.

Thinking it over now, however, he realized that if he had been more alert he could have used the opportunity to smash the trader's power once and for all by proclaiming a kind of general strike. That would have achieved his end effectively and without undue risk of violence, for with all work on the plantation brought to a standstill, Strang would have been forced to come to terms.

The chance had passed, however, and though some such general plan still commenced itself to him as his most obvious weapon, it would now require careful preparation and would have to be carried through in the face of watchful and bitter opposition.

He had no idea of the time it was broad daylight, but that meant nothing for the sun rose shortly after six o'clock and he was never called before seven. It felt late though, and after listening to hear if the house-boys were moving about, he got out of bed and opened the door of the living-room.

He had expected to find it bathed in early morning sunshine, but to his surprise the sun had left the room altogether; and when he glanced out of the unglazed window, he saw from its altitude that the time must be somewhere around ten o'clock.

The significance of this did not strike him at once, but then he noticed that the room was exactly as he had left it on the previous night. Nothing had been tidied or swept, and his breakfast was not laid.

He stared about him for a few moments, and then it slowly dawned upon him that here was Strang's first counter-stroke. His house-boys had left him.

He stood for a while thinking. A first slight it seemed a pretty move for the trader to have made, but, on second thoughts, it occurred to him that it was probably the beginning of a definite attempt to isolate him. It meant, for instance, that his meals would not be brought to him in the usual way.

He went slowly back into his bedroom, and, having shaved and washed himself somewhat sketchily in the residue of the water left in the jug from the previous morning, he dressed and returned to the living room.

Here he made a light breakfast of fruit, washed down with water from the half-empty carafe on the sideboard, and then settled down to thinking out his next move in the face of this latest development.

Swift and decisive action was out of the question, for he realized that he could do nothing by himself; but at the end of half an hour he had evolved a plan which promised a fair measure of success. It meant waiting for nightfall, however, and he decided that it would be better for him to remain indoors till then. No doubt, the house-boys had orders to report his movements during the day, and if he remained out of sight he could at least keep them guessing about him.

In the meantime, it occurred to him that he might employ his forced leisure in drawing up a report of the events which had brought about the present position. Now that he had taken his stand, he could hardly do better than to proceed upon official lines, and a written explanation of the circumstances might prove of value later. He hoped that he might bring Strang to terms unofficially, but if the worst came to the worst, it would, at least, prove that such action as he proposed to take was being forced upon him.

Big Hand in Future

These men will play a big hand in setting future policy on opening up the north where economic prospects are bright. Private industry now is studying the possibility of harnessing the Yukon river to provide a 4,300-horsepower hydro plant; to construct a smelter probably in southern Yukon or northern British Columbia; tap new ore bodies and set up facilities for new metallurgical processes that will provide jobs for thousands of workers.

Military activity in the north is increasing, too, with attention focused on the big Canada-U. S. radar network and weather stations built on the northern tundra.
