

COURSE E CONF

Once upon a weekend, there were two groups of people who decided to change their world. They were very, very funny characters, because when they looked at one another, they saw what they wanted to see. They didn't see it like it was or is. When one group looked at the other, they saw these really tall, tall characters whose shoes were podiums. And on their heads they wore these huge flat hats with tassles. In one hand of each tallie there was a rolled parchment tied with a ribbon. Now these tall, tall, Tallies were really funny because they had to bend over every time that they came to a threshold. As a result, the Tallies spent most of their time bent over.

When the Tallies looked across the room they saw these short, short characters who walked around on their knees. These shorties were overloaded with books. Because they were there to change their world they had to talk to one another. So they talked, and talked, and talked....As time progressed the Tallies began to have pains in their backs, and the Shorties began to have kinks in their necks.

Now it looked like a discussion between the two groups was going to fail until one particularly short Shortie came up with a brainstorm. He walked to one Tallie who seemed particularly in pain and said, "Why don't you take your podiums off?" So the Tallie took off his podiums, and then realized that he could stand up straight. It was then that he noticed that the pain in his back went away. Needless to say, this Tallie felt quite relieved until he looked down to the Shortie and saw him still in pain. "Why don't you stand up?", the Tallie said to the Shortie. So the Shortie stood up. It was then that the Shortie and the Tallie realized that they could look each other in the eye. This was quite a discovery to both so they went back to tell their groups the good news. The whole room was in an uproar with podiums flying about and Shorties standing up. Everyone was breathing sighs of relief.

We have already mentioned that these two groups were together to change their world. But everyone was nervous to talk until the first Tallie and the first Shortie began talking. And everyone followed suit. So they talked and talked and talked....That's how much they changed their world. That was the weekend.

The following is an article submitted by President R.J. Baker concerning his thoughts on the Course Evaluation Conference held this past weekend.

I think that the weekend has been an overwhelming success in bringing students and faculty together to discuss an important issue. Students have repeatedly told me how impressed they have been by the faculty's participation in the discussions, and the faculty tell me the same thing about the students. It is very gratifying to see so much mutual respect, but it is faintly sad that we have to come away from the the respect quite so open however, is having more not a complaint this one.

I've been the very large agreement during the end. It seems that everyone wants to work improve learning clear that we agree that the course and preparation is necessary, however, agreements on which we can goals. In my there was too on the fact that should be developed outlines for not just for are now. There should give the number assignments, the inations, and fact, the more the better. The outlines should be able by November fall semester the end of last the spring semester the following esters course I did not hear so, I take it something similar required for session course My second the weekend with hindsight it was probably on a part of rather than It's clear the concern of even that of improving and that
