The Thorpe Affair
By Phillip Lesly
CHAPTER I

To Terry Lang, whom a stranger would think much too young to have been a crack reporter for eight years, had come the inevitable conclusion that between him and his city editor lay an impenetrable barrier. The Sun was a good paper, and the pay roll department issued fine-looking checks each Monday, and the general attitude toward its special reporter was congenial—but the conception its editors had of big stories—big enough for Terry Lang to cover—was little short of disgusting.

For instance, this blackmail affair. Anyone would think that after playing up the real mother vs. foster mother mess in the Storms affair for two weeks, any sane city editor would be anxious to get something into his paper that wasn't gooey with soft soap and forced sentimentality. But no. The day after the decision in the Storms case Terry found John Deane waiting for him with a wide smile and a bright idea.

"It's the yarn of the year," the city editor remarked. His 5-foot, 2-inch frame seemed inadequate for the 260 pounds that graced it. His paunch separated his backbone from the edge of the desk by 30 inches. He handed Terry a note that read: "City Editor: 'Manville Sun. 'Many women, wives and daughters of wealthy men, are being blackmailed because of losses at gambling houses. I know, because I am one of them. We pay because we don't want our husbands to know about the gambling. Please do something about it. I prefer to remain anonymous, for obvious reasons.'"

"That's all the dope so far," Deane said, "but it sounds like when we get it all it'll be a honey. Go out and see what's behind it. And also if you can dig up a crooked gambling angle, that's all right, too."

Lovable You

Skin so soft . . . smooth touched with a lingering lovable fragrance. You know your complexion is clear . . . fresh . . . radiant from daily care with Colgate Beauty Soap. COLGATE Beauty Soap soothes as it cleanses . . . leaves your skin fragrant . . . soft . . . and smooth.

"What's your hurry?" he asked. "I—I was trying to catch a streetcar." She looked back anxiously. Terry grinned. It was a wide, friendly, attractive grin that lighted his almost handsome face and made sombreness seem out of place. "What luck! Right here you have caught the finest private streetcar in Manville. And at your service." Her lips tightened. She glared at him coldly and tried to walk around the car. Terry moved it forward to block her way. She stepped back, still glaring, and tried the back way. Terry shifted into reverse. She halted, and a gleam of desperation came into her eyes. She glanced back furtively. Terry watched her, still smiling. He held the door open. "All aboard. Have your fare ready please."
