The Fretful Voice

By Thornton W. Burgess

The harshest voice in time of stress, A sudden sweetness may possess. Old Brother Nature, In Farmer Brown's sugar house over in the maple grove two little people shivered and shook. One was Peter Rabbit; the other was Whitefoot the Wood Mouse. Some one was trying to get into that sugar house. Both were sure that whoever it was it must be an enemy.

He was complaining fretfully because for all his gnawing he couldn't get in.

It seemed to Peter a long, long time that he crouched as far back under the bunk as he could get and listened to those dreadful gnawing teeth. Really it wasn't such a long time. Time always seems long when you are afraid.

in here for?" replied Whitefoot. "I could name some folks who would like to get in here to catch us," said Peter. "Well, Prickly Porky isn't one of those. He doesn't know we are in here and he wouldn't be after us if he did," said Whitefoot. "Do you suppose he is the one who was on the roof?" asked Peter. "Of course," replied his small neighbor. "I wonder if he thinks he can gnaw through that door." For a few minutes they kept their tongues still and listened to the fretful voice outside. Prickly Porky was talking to himself. He was a habit of doing this. He was complaining fretfully because for all his gnawing he could not get in. Once or twice he shuffled around the building to see if he could get in somewhere else. But he was soon back at the door, gnawing and fretting as he gnawed.
