MARY HAWORTH

Interest In Cheese Cake Art Indication Of Fear

Dear Mary Haworth: We have lived in this area only a few months, and I have no relatives or trusted friends here whom I might consult.

My husband and I have been married 18 years. In this past year he has become very interested in the opposite sex. He will sit for hours looking at magazines that feature pin-up pictures of scantily clad females.

Also when we are out, if he sees a woman with a good figure, he stares at her openly. This not only embarrasses me, but is making me very unhappy.

I am no Cleopatra but I am considered quite attractive. Should I have a showdown? Or just continue to cry myself to sleep? How have I failed him?

We have two lovely children and the boy is beginning to notice that something is wrong.

One night my husband called me Cleo (let's say) when my name is Tess. I am at the stage of thinking of leaving him. Would I be justified? I am most anxious to have your advice. Sincerely,

Dear T. S.: Your husband's preoccupation with cheese cake art (the trade name for photographic displays of semi-nude females) and his challenging stares at goodlooking women nowadays, suggest that he is trying (unconsciously) to combat fears that his sex vigor is on the wane.

In mooning over cheese cake art, perhaps he is trying for aphrodisiac effect, testing to see if he would still respond with excitement if confronted with sexy sirens.

Also in ogling well built women, his unconscious purpose may be to invite a reassuring reply to the implicit question: "Madame, would you be interested in me as a lover?"

You may wonder why such shy dreaming would seize on him suddenly. Who knows? A medical specialist or a psychiatrist, checking his physical or emotional health, might locate the cause and propose suitable remedies.

But to help you realize that you aren't at fault, necessarily — that it remains to prove whether you have "failed" him in any way — I refer you to a recent article in Redbook Magazine, titled "Husbands and Old Love" (see the March 1963 issue).

Among other things, the article reports: "When the conditions of a man's work or his life involve a constant eroding of his pride, his sexuality suffers. . .

"Unfortunately there are many ways in which life brutally cuts down a man's pride, many times when humiliation may outweigh self - esteem.

"William Whyte Jr., in his famous picture of the 'Organization Man' has described the tensions within a large organization," the report continues. "He and a host of other writers have shown the kind of backbiting and disparaging that accompany jockeying for position."

"The man who is on the receiving end of that treatment is not likely to be a satisfactory marriage partner. Nor is the worker who is constantly undermined by a sadistic foreman or employer; the small business man who is being assailed by abusive creditors; or the government worker whose competence is constantly derided by his superiors."

You mention being newcomers here. Possibly business reversals or loss of a job preceding the move, leading to the anxiety of scrambling for security in middle age, have fractured your husband's self confidence, thus introducing the symptomatic behavior that troubles you.

In any case, the constructive reaction on your part is to see a first - rate doctor or psychologist, tell him the whole story, and get his guidance in meeting the problem. M.H.
