

Happenings of The Week

A murmur of dismay rippled through movie theatres all over Britain this week when a news-reel showed Queen Mary in a wheel chair. The occasion was her visit to the British Industries Fair. She toured on foot in the early part of day; later took to a wheel chair. It was one of the first public concessions the beloved member of Britain's royal family has ever made to her years. She will be 84 today.

It brought home to a nation which has never been able to think of her as old that even her inflexible will is not proof against time. Officially the Queen Mother is in fairly good health. But her subjects, knowing she would not have resorted to a wheel chair except in extremity, are worried that perhaps her spartan mode of living and the many duties she insists on performing are too much for her now. Queen Mary lives in a great barn-like mansion, Marlborough House, three blocks from Buckingham Palace. Until last winter she insisted that the house have a minimum of heat and she kept the windows of her bedroom wide open. It took a serious cold and a painful attack of arthritis plus the pleadings of her physicians to get her to close the windows. She resolutely refused to go to the Riviera for the winter.

The Queen Mother believes that duty comes above self and she conceives it to be her duty to help out with official functions as long as she is able to get about. However, her journeys from Marlborough House are fewer and her old-fashioned limousine is seen less often in the streets. She still attends an occasional play, however, or takes an afternoon drive. Her automobile, a 1937 copy of a 1921 model, was made especially for her. Its huge windows have earned it the nickname "the glass house". It has a second dashboard set into the back of the chauffeur's seat. She takes her backseat driving seriously. The Queen Mother still gets up early, attends to her correspondence, eats sparingly and smokes an occasional cigarette. She wears little make-up, has not changed her style of clothing—pastel colored toques and stockings, plain coats—for more than 40 years.

ELLEN'S DIARY

By An Island Farmer's Wife

In the sorcery of tonight, we would forget every ill of life—every last misery and sorrow, indeed the haste and restlessness of the age, the perpetual "seeking after" though it be but a mirage, which so often appears to be the chief end and purpose of humans in this strange world. Only briefly however, may we cease to regard these things which disturb our thoughts as we go about the affairs of our day, or linger as well when at length the shadows have brought us to our rest. We would forget for the moment that here as the weak winds to a peaceful close, somewhere, someone is lonely for a child or other loved one recently taken, who may not walk with them earthily ways again. Neither would we remember that perhaps even now in the silence of the farm-home, someone is opening the bars to that shadowy meadow which is "the valley of the shadow" to enter there upon that unknown path, we like to fancy is similar to that pleasant one which leads this family to the spring in the field across the creek. It is hard-beaten by footsteps, and under the alders it winds intriguingly by streamside. Shelters from the harsh winds by the rising heights, the slope above, it lead on to new scenes of delight.

These things we would forget for the moment and every last sorrow of bereavement or disappointment. Forget too, the incessant wranglings and bitterness between people and nations, the bickering and heart-breaking war in the troubled near and far east. Every pestilence of day and every terror of night, the haunting fears and foreboding that beset the steps of humans, we would have dissolved for a space—and forever, and dwell upon instead the beauty and enchantment which rightly world-over belong to the season at hand. We would put eternal hope in the place of despair, happiness where now are "the ashes of mourning," smiles in place of the tears.

What busy days these are on farms as we now arrive at the peak of the cropping! Busy and yet delightful for have we not awaited them for the space of a year? Back they have come giving us new incidents to record on memory's page-happenings that one day will be quite as lovely and nostalgic to us as are the best of those of the years now gone. We suppose we shall ever remember of this week, this farm's transition from horse-drawn machinery to that powered by a tractor. It was no easy change, this one that ended the good days we had known and gave us the unproven, instead, James standing idly by lane-side, (with youngest grandson adopting a like attitude) no familiar reins in his hands, no team waiting his guidance, watched the new machinery spring into action. There was, we are sure, bewilderment on his face—and some regret—and at our window upstairs, an unbidden briny tear welled... daughter later when she observed "Horses are best! Tractors can't nicker at you, and" she smiled "you can't rub a tractor's nose!"

But items like these we would

That Body Of Yours

By James W. Barton, M.D.

REHABILITATION OF HEART PATIENTS INCREASES THE NATION'S MANPOWER

One of the good things learned from World Wars I and II was that an attack of heart disease (coronary thrombosis) does not mean that the patient is doomed nor that another attack will prove fatal. This "death sentence" of yesteryear is not commonly heard any more; today physicians, particularly heart specialists, have outlined a program of rehabilitation which, if followed faithfully by the patient, does in many cases rehabilitate him, making it possible for him to return to his occupation with practically no fear for the future.

In Modern Concepts of Cardiovascular Disease, published monthly by the American Heart Association, rehabilitation is defined as "the return of a person disabled by accident or disease to his greatest physical, mental, emotional, social, vocational and economic usefulness, and, if employable, an opportunity for gainful employment."

In addition, it is emphasized that, while economic security is essential, rehabilitation aims also at maintaining the "personal dignity of the individual and enlarging his capacity for living by enabling him to make the best of his physical and mental faculties. Rehabilitation of the patient with heart and blood vessel disease, then, would meet practically the complete need of the individual, enabling him to become a normal member of the community.

It is estimated that of those who have come safely through their first attack of coronary thrombosis, from 40 to 70 per cent suffer some decrease in mental and physical ability.

While at present there is no complete knowledge of how to prevent further attacks it is known that solace rather than mystical adventures.

A child born on this day may need early supervision lest curiosity, erratic or erotic tendencies later develop into quixotic or unusual practices. Directed into proper channels, these could be transmitted to inspirational, creative writings, music, art.

Day After Tomorrow The astrological forecast indicates that sudden and quite unanticipated occurrence may bring about change of plans and objectives. And while the adventure may be wise and safe in itself, the abruptness of the situation may excite and stimulate to the point of rash and impulsive conduct, inciting opposition from elders.

For the Birthday Those whose birthday it is may have opportunity for surprising and beneficial change, dramatic and stimulating. But at the same time the latter stimuli may be so over-accented and alluring as to exact penalties and draw strenuous opposition from superiors. With discretion and calm behavior, under unusual thrills, some compliments are in order.

A child born on this day could experience an exciting and conspicuous adventure in living, but runaway impulses and queer "temperament" could challenge the approval of his elders.

DOROTHY DIX SAYS—

Jealous Father

Man Subconsciously Resents His Daughter's Boy Friends

DEAR MISS DIX: I have been married twenty-three years and have two girls, one 19, the other 16 years old. As long as the children were young, all was harmony in our home. But now that the girls have grown up there come the boy friends and late hours. Two or three times, sometimes four times a week, they are out and do not come home until 12 or 1 o'clock or even 2 o'clock, and when I told them how indecent this was and forbade them to do it my wife took their part and told me I was old-fashioned. This brought about such dissension that I have left my family to live alone. Did I do the right thing? Don't you think my daughters acted selfishly?

ANSWER: I think that you are perhaps one of the fathers who, without realizing it, are a little jealous of their daughters' boy friends. Many men are like that. It comes with a shock to some fathers that their little girls have grown up and are interested in other men besides them and that Father isn't the center of their universe any more.
