

Bilingual Canada Forecast By Publisher In Montreal

By GERALD FREEMAN
Canadian Press Staff Writer
MONTREAL (CP) — Publisher Pierre Tisseyre of Montreal predicted Friday that Canada is destined to become a nation of "cultural supermen," bilingual from coast to coast.

"The future of Canada rests on bilingualism," said Mr. Tisseyre, one of a three-member panel in North America at the second McGill conference on world affairs. The conference has drawn 100 delegates from 23 Canadian and 11 American universities to discuss aspects of the American-Canadian relations.

Chairman of Friday's panel was Mason Wade, director of Canadian studies at the University of Rochester. Other panelists were novelist F. C. MacLennan and poet Robert Choquette, both of Montreal.

BATTLE IS WON
"The French Canadians may not realize it," Mr. Tisseyre said, "but the battle they have been fighting for 200 years has been won. But they go on fighting it." "From Vancouver to Nova Scotia, Canada is to become a bilingual country."

Mr. MacLennan, who said he regrets speaking French so badly, said that in other Canadian provinces "it's not so easy to learn French as it is here."

"French is an exceedingly difficult language to learn to speak." It had to be spoken well, or not at all, while there was a "basic English" that could be used while people learning English became more familiar with the fine points.

There would have to be better French teaching for C- to be come completely bilingual. Mr. MacLennan said he went to school in Nova Scotia, when French used to be taught from the ninth grade by "teachers who couldn't speak it."

BOTH CAN BENEFIT
Mr. Choquette said the rest of Canada could benefit from the warmth of the French-Canadian temperament, while the French-speaking Canadians could learn discipline from those who speak English.

Mr. MacLennan said it is "absurd" to use such clumsy terms as "French-speaking Canadians" and "English-speaking Canadians."

He suggested they be called Canadians and Canadians.

France Rejects British Free Trade Suggestions

PARIS (Reuters) — France slammed the door Friday on a British proposal for a 17-nation free-trade area in Western Europe after more than a year of on-and-off negotiations.

Premier Charles de Gaulle's cabinet announced following an emergency session that the British proposal for a 17-nation free-trade area in Western Europe after more than a year of on-and-off negotiations.

The announcement came at the close of a two-day conference of the 17 member nations of the Organization for European Economic Co-operation.

Thursday night, a conference of the 17 member nations of the Organization for European Economic Co-operation.

Britain fears tariff-cutting in the common market would discriminate against nations outside it. It proposed a plan to link the common market nations—France, West Germany, Italy, Belgium, Holland and Luxembourg—with Britain and the other 10 members of the OEEC.

Britain's chief negotiator, Reginald Maudling, told a press conference Friday that if agreement on a free-trade zone is not reached by Jan. 1, "a step will have been taken toward discrimination in Europe."

Maudling said this step would "set the progress made in the OEEC in the last 10 years back on its heels."

Maudling rejected criticism that the British plan would undermine the common market or that the 11 nations outside the market would see its benefits without being willing to make sacrifices.

"We recognize that the process of negotiations involves making concessions," he said. "If there is no real will or desire to agree, concessions are purposeless."

French Information Minister Jacques Soustelle told reporters British plan was based mainly on that France's rejection of the British plan was based mainly on the wide gulf in the various tariffs of the 17 nations. Another big obstacle, he said, was the differing social and working conditions in each country.

New and increased business has been reflected in higher operating profits. These—after all expenses and other charges and after all usual provisions except for income taxes—have risen by a little more than $175,000, i.e., from $1,624,246 to $1,800,043, which amount was appropriated as follows:

Contribution to staff pension society $150,000; provision for income taxes $775,000; dividends $500,000. Total $1,425,000.

As can be seen from above figures, net profits before dividends amounted to $875,043, or $1.75 per share, compared with $1.60 in 1957.

However an extra day was necessary, said Moncton CNR officials because of "complexities of the job."
