THE DUTCH REBELS.

Among the speeches on the second reading of Mr. Innes' treason bill, one which attracted a great deal of attention at the time was the speech delivered by Mr. Wessels, the Bond member for Vryburg. Mr. Wessels, it will be remembered, was imprisoned by the Transvaal authorities for loyalty endeavoring to prevent his constituents from taking part in the rebellion, and after several weeks in jail was sent over the border to Delagoa Bay. Mr. Wessels spoke strongly in favor of the bill, which, he declared, the rebels themselves would gladly accept.

The following extract from the 'Cape Times' parliamentary report gives an able exposition of the bill itself and of the attitude of a Dutch border district during the rebellion:

'In considering the kind of tribunal by which the rebels should be tried they had to remember that race feeling was very strong in this country at the present time. If the people were tried by an ordinary tribunal it would be impossible to try them in the districts in which it was alleged their crimes had been committed and they would consequently have to be removed for trial to such centres as Kimberley, Graham's Town and Capetown; centres in which the English predominated, and where the juries would be largely drawn from Englishmen. Every man had the right to be tried by his peers, but there were times when, owing to peculiar circumstances, a special tribunal should be established, and surely if ever there were special circumstances they existed at the present time. Honorable members on the Opposition side had said much about an amnesty for the rebels. If they had only the Dutch people to consider it would be arguable whether it would be better to have an amnesty, on the ground that it was questionable whether political proscription would tend to make these people any more loyal to the Queen. But they had a large English-speaking community in this country, and their claim to be heard on the matter could not be denied; they felt that some measure of punishment must be awarded. He thought that this was a very reasonable position. But they had further to consider the question whether, if this House had passed an amnesty measure, such a measure would have been accepted by the House of Commons or another place. He believed that the bill before the House was the irreducible minimum that the House of Commons and the British people would accept. Much had been said as to compulsion to rebel. He believed that in a case where a man could show that he had been compelled to join the enemy that he would be given every opportunity to call witnesses. Speaking for his district, he said that 90 percent of the people were only anxious to be prevented from going to prison, saying that they had committed a great error, but did not object to disfranchisement. They said to him, 'Do anything to keep us out of jail.' That was the mandate of his constituents, his unfortunate constituents, and when he found that the interests of his party clashed with the interests of his constituents he would act upon the mandate of his constituents. Sixty-five percent of the people of his constituency had no document or proof showing that they were commanded. He denied the existence of any conspiracy on the part of the Afrikaner Bond. He was an official of that body, and he never heard a word about conspiracy. What surprised him was the eagerness of the border colonists to join the invaders. The men who had guided and advised them for years were unheeded; the people took everything that was said to them by any minor Transvaal official as gospel. His constituents called him a rebel because he would not follow them. If he had not made his journey up there he would never have believed that men who had lived all their lives under the Union Jack could have possibly taken up such a position. But he was there; he was an eye witness. He was told; 'The Englishman will never come here again; it is impossible; he is going to be driven far away.' Then he saw the amount of falsehood and misrepresentation circulated by the Transvaal Government. In Pretoria there was a regular bureau started to spread these miserable lies in the disturbed dis-

RHEUMATISM

The people were told officially that France and Germany and Russia were all coming to help them, and that the English were to be driven into the sea. He said to them: 'It is an impossibility. I have just come from England, and I can tell you the feeling of the people is unanimous. If it cost them two hundred millions of money they are going to crush you.' No; 'the Transvaal Government had had these assurances from Europe,' and it was utterly impossible to convince these people that they were on the wrong course altogether. The misrepresentations were so ingeniously manufactured that the ignorant was bound to believe them; the falsehoods were so judiciously distributed, and so poisoned the people's minds, that it was useless trying to do anything with them. They were told from Pretoria that several prominent and influential Afrikaners in the Colony had taken up arms. When he told them he had a special message from the then prime minister to them, exhorting them at all costs to be loyal, when he had a message from Mr. Hofmeyr to be loyal, they said; 'We don't believe such a thing. Mr. Van den Heever is marching on to Capetown with 5,000 men, and the vierkleur will be on Table Mountain in a week.' They had also been told that several members of this House had joined the federal forces. In fact, the Transvaal Government left no stone unturned to poison the people's minds and place facts before them in such a way as to make them appear untruthful. They were taught to believe that the psychological moment had arrived, and it was now for them to strike for Afrikanerdom to be triumphant. No one felt more sorry for these misguided people than he did, but he found the stream too strong for him to stay its course. But, sorry as he felt, he believed also that the bill was a very lenient one, one for which he could conscientiously vote. It was not vindictive, it would do substantial justice, and he hoped it would be the means hereafter of uniting the two races in South Africa.
