James will speak not without a certain nostalgia of those days when through the warmer seasons, eggs from the farm, "bought the groceries." And the crocks, and firkins, and prints of dairy butter, carried in the back of the buggy or express to customers, contributed no small share toward the expenses of the farm. Others will recall too those days, not all it may be with a longing. And yet to look back is to see how altogether challenging and good those times were, possibly because in the main our hearts were young.

Then, on such a day as this, suddenly we are aware that the little track is missing from the yard and a silence prevails about. We spy it afar in a field, or following that lane which leads away to a range of pasture. And we smile. The farmers, with Mack and maybe the other lads in attendance, are off on a happy outing "to see how those feeders are doing!"

"Ellen" James in the old arm chair exclaims putting down his reading.

"We've clean forgotten to listen in to the weather tonight!" Whether or not we shall be favored with a haying day tomorrow, we do not know. We do know, however, there will come a brand new day in the morning!

Until tomorrow — Diary Good - night.....

MARY HAWORTH
Self-Sacrifice Rewarded By Jealousy And Spite

DEAR MARY HAWORTH: Years ago when we were children I catered to my younger sister, who was withdrawn, introverted, moody.

We didn't have much, but anything extra that I had I would give to her, mainly because she said nobody loved her. And on many occasions she threatened to jump out of the window.

Now I am reaping my reward: she is my constant critic. Always she must be the center of attraction, and she wants to be highly thought of. Meanwhile she tears me down, criticizing my speech, correcting my grammar, wisecracking about my facial mannerisms, my mental ability, etc.

She does this any time, any place, in front of mutual friends, just for amusement on some occasions. I resent this and object to her ridicule. She gets haughty and says I'm sensitive; that I have to learn to laugh at myself (I can, but I dislike being laughed at); to learn to laugh at that I'm stupid, etc.

A doctor has told me she is jealous of me, that I am the stronger person, that one who constantly criticizes another is jealous of that person. I find this hard to believe, as she is attractive, intelligent, witty in a sarcastic way, able to hold friends.

Her friends make many of the same mistakes I do, yet she tolerates them all, even finds excuses for them and glosses them over. She has walked off and left me standing in the street, subway or department store, because something I said was "idiotic." Thus she aims to make me appear small and completely wrong.

I need help to cope with her tongue. Lately I have an overpowering urge to slap her face. Please advise me before I do something I may regret. G.Y.

Dear G.Y.: As I get the picture, your sister's personality is almost irremediably warped and bitter. She is psychologically incapable of experiencing love, hence has always misjudged your early protective-type generosity towards her as a form of weakness. And for this weakness (as she construes it) she despises you, neurotically.

Also, because you are sisters, she tends to identify with you, as if you were a sort of mirror-image of herself, in company. Again, a neurotic distortion of reality.

Thus, when she is criticizing your speech, grammar, facial expressions, mental ability, etc., in the presence of others seemingly for amusement at times, she is (in effect) speaking the "respected" lines that she fancies others may be thinking of both of you in the situation.

In a sense she may be jealous of you, as the doctor suggests, but that statement doesn't begin to penetrate the twisted motivation and complex compulsiveness of her chronic "pecking" at you.

I think it is more correct to say that, to her, close kinship and even a shell of interdependency equate familiarity, and familiarity equates contempt, and the contempt she spits at you is, in reality, an unmasking of herself as is: to-wit, an unlovely person who will visit hate upon anybody who cares how she feels.

Thus if she slashes at you with a special brand of scornful criticism that she seems to reserve for you alone, never judging others in the same light, it probably is because you put up with this "inner self" of hers, in a spirit of wanting to be friendly, loving and kind, hopeful that forbearance may tenderize her heart eventually.

Very likely her friends, so-called, would give her short shrift if she spoke her moods as freely to them. So she says only what they want to hear, as a necessity of keeping-in-touch.

Now for advice: You've got to toughen up towards your sister, become self-reliant and essentially detached as regards her neurotic unfairness. Learn to need nothing from her in the way of sisterly consolation. As you wean yourself from emotional hunger on that score, she will treat you with care if she sees you at all. M.H.

ELLEN'S DIARY
Rain Washes The Fields And Haying Is Delayed

When the wind is not pleased to smile brightly, and for the haying, the wind sulks up the creek, how do our farmers pass that interval of waiting which sooner or later sets the machinery in motion once more? Not indolently of course. None of these long summer days are allowed to "slip idly away." No matter the weather, though skies may be cloud, and showers wash our world about, always some work of the farm comes to hand. In the suspension of fieldwork, they fill various pieces of the chore-ing together to pass the hours in a satisfying pattern, until skies smile again.

Such a day was this: one of no fieldwork. True, if we, as once were growing that Island cash crop that is potatoes, there would have been cultivating or spraying, because presently the sun shone though no wind of the haying came by.

At Alderlea, we saw the farmers check the machines to have them in readiness for it when skies should clear favorably. We heard James make repairs to a sty in the piggery. And the younger farmer and Mack, from the house across the lane, at like work in the barns. They appear: those broken panes, to be now replaced; the hinges that hang awry, the door - fasteners that need to be re-set.

There are too, on a day like this which was neither fair nor yet "foul", but merely indifferent as to haying - weather, the outgoings and incomings. Seamp ie exclaims over, which attend to the business of the place. It may be that an animal goes to market — a fat one of the pasturing herd, or a choice lamb of the flock. And in return, mill-feed, or some other of the countless needs of the farm is brought in.

Sometimes a necessary excursion may bring in as little as the years the housewives require for their breads, in which instance as in all our requirements of groceries now, no pro-
