MARY HAWORTH

Quarrelsome Husband Has Ugly Suspicions

Dear Mary Haworth: Fifteen years ago I went to Europe to marry my husband. From the first day of our marriage we quarrelled about little things and have had many misunderstandings.

He dislikes my family to the point of hate, because they live beyond their means, he says; and he is a poor man who can't afford to give me what they have—although I never demand this of him.

All I want is to move into a steam heated apartment, away from our cold water flat, where the children are sick most of the winter, due to the chill drafty rooms.

Now he is accusing me of infidelity, something he never did before. It just started this past week. He comes home, looks around suspiciously, calls me bad names, then goes to his part time job... Later he makes love to me, then reviles me. I think I am headed for a nervous breakdown.

FAMILY HORRIFIED
His brothers have told him that his suspicions are ridiculous, but he insists that his thoughts must be right. My family is horrified, and blames me for letting things go this far. Still they say it is our affair; and that he should see a psychiatrist, or I should see a lawyer, and settle things once and for all.

We've had him to a doctor, for a complete physical check up, and the doctor finds nothing wrong. He refuses to get psychiatric help—says he's okay, and I'm the one who needs it. I am at my wits' end. I don't sleep nights for fear of him and besides he wakes at midnight and 3 a.m. and recites his suspicions.

I don't know what to do. Your suggestions would be much appreciated. G.F.

Dear G.F.: Your family's attitude—in blaming you for letting things go this far, while piously washing their hands of the problem, referring it back to you and your husband—is pretty heartless, it seems to me.

Probably they've always had a rejecting bias towards you, and that's why you've put up with so much ill treatment in marriage—because you felt there was no "Court of Appeal," to which you might turn for justice, protection, redress, etc.

Now about your husband—he is emotionally sick, of course. Any body who knows beans about human behavior would recognize that. But usually people close to the picture don't have the courage to speak out and call a spade a spade, when a man of disturbed mind is on the rampage. So you husband is more or less without help that he needs, in this situation.

The doctor who found nothing wrong with him physically was reporting on only a part of the picture. Assuming he knew the background of your husband's sick suspicions, he should have taken it upon himself as a professional duty, to win your husband's confidence sufficiently to get him to a psychiatrist. But maybe you failed to give the doctor a fillin on this score.

ANXIETY COMPLEX

As for what ails your husband, undoubtedly it is an anxiety complex with a long history. It goes back to his first frustrations, in his earlier years. And all his life, he has been letting his anger rule him, instead of talking control, in the light of understanding. Hence his continuous quarrelling with you.

In his two most recent jobs, he has been too much alone with his thoughts, probably — his chronically bitter, resentful, hostile thought about everyone he's ever known. This, added to daily stress and general discouragement about his earnings competence, has led to his present ebb, and irrational hate is beginning to take hold.

He crazily assumes that you are unfaithful, because he unconsciously despises himself, and therefore is convinced that you must surely scorn and detest him too—and must be putting on an act, in seeming to care.

My advice is to get immediate and continuing counsel from your
