 CHAPTER XIX

Continued
 It was obvious to Thurlow that the trader was going out of his way to make things easy for him, and though he suspected that the motive was something stronger than the mere desire to make amends for his past hostility, he was little disposed to quarrel with it on that account. He had got out of a particularly nasty situation very largely by Strang's unlooked-for help, and now that the captain's doubts had been so far allayed, he was not prepared to offer him any encouragement to reopen the question of the dead man's relationship with the real Thurlow in official quarters. Nevertheless, he affected an air of indifference in order not to appear too eager to close the incident.
 "That's up to you, skipper," he said. "If you're not satisfied and want to report this case in Auckland."
 "Auckland" the captain broke in. "No blame fear. I've come out of me way far enough as it is without hiking right down to Auckland just for the fun o' spinnin' em the year there! I'm short-handed as it is—no havin' no mate—an' the sooner I lift the Moreton Bay Light, the happier I'm goin' to be. No, mister. If you're bustin' to take action, I don't mind forwarding your report for you when we get back to Brisbane—or even swearin' out an affidavit before a lawyer there if you want to do a thing more to do with me time than to go putting another thousand miles on to the trip."
 Thurlow shrugged.
 "Well, in that case we'd better drop it," he suggested. "I'd like to have known what this poor devil was after, but whatever it was he didn't get it—and that's the end of the matter as far as I'm concerned. And until somebody comes along with definite proof that I'm somebody else, I'll take it for granted that I'm the only genuine Resident of this Island!" he added.
 "You'll probably have to wait quite a while for that!" Strang told him with a laugh. "Still, if this business has done nothing else it's brought us another visitor, so we ought to be grateful." He turned to the captain. "We really came out with the idea of towing you in, skipper. We saw that the wind had died on you, and I didn't think you'd like to chance making the entrance in the dark anyway. But here's my boat alongside—so what about it?"
 Rather to Thurlow's disappointment, the captain declined the offer.
 "No, I guess not," he returned after a little awkward hesitation. "I'm due to sail on my regular run to the Solomon and New Britain at the end of the month, and this trip is going to make me late as it is. Thankin' you all the same."
 It seemed to Thurlow that he was not quite easy in his mind and he would have been glad to have had him spend the night ashore if only to re-establish his former cordial relations with him. But in spite of Strang's persuasions, he stuck to his point.

 "Well, if you won't, you won't," the latter said regretfully. "I was hoping to make a night of it again. But if you're itching to get away we'd better clear out."
 "There ain't no special hurry as far as I'm concerned," the captain told him. "The blame wind's gone altogether, but there's a three knot current settin' us south an' you'll have a longish pull back if you ain't careful."
 "Well, we'd better be going then," the trader said rising to his feet. "Oh, by the way, what do you intend to do with these?" And he nodded to the dead man's papers on the table.
 "Turn 'em over to the police in Brisbane with the rest of his gear

When I report the death," the captain returned promptly. "Maybe they can find out who he was and let his folks know what's happened to him."
 "Well, I think you ought to keep these," Strang said to Thurlow, picking up the letter and photograph. "After all, they concern you more than anyone else, and the chances are that the Brisbane police will simply stick them in a pigeon-hole and forget them."
 In point of fact Thurlow had been wondering whether it wouldn't be safer to get possession of them in case of accidents, and he promptly took them from the trader and slipped them into his pocket.
 The captain eyed him in some doubt for a moment, but he said nothing, and when they had refused his somewhat half-hearted invitation to have another drink, he led the way up on deck again.

taining with records, new dance steps, perhaps a showing of home movies, and ending up with simple refreshments. Consult your local paper for news of happenings around town that will provide low-cost amusement. Don't let the boy get into the habit of never spending money on you, though. But don't make your concern with his finances too obvious. He probably has pride, too.

DEAR MISS DIX: I have been going with a very nice man for 16 months. I'm 24 and he's 30. Though he seems to like me, he has mentioned casually that he never intends to marry. Do you think he'll change his mind?
HELENE F.

ANSWER: Not if you continue your present rate of dating. He enjoys your companionship and hospitality but is quite willing to let things remain there. If you try going out with other men for a while, he may realize how much your loss would mean to him, and perhaps offer the security of a wedding band.

DEAR MISS DIX: I am 34 years old and have been divorced for a year. I have been going out with a divorced woman slightly younger. We both claim to be just good friends. She claims she doesn't want to go out with men, yet she plans way ahead for things we are to do together. She has met my family, and is quite chummy with my mother. Yet, in spite of all her apparent interest in me, she says we are seeing too much of each other. I have a small son whose custody I shall soon have since my ex-wife doesn't want him. The girl is very fond of the boy and thinks it splendid that I am going to have him. I would like to marry her, yet wonder if she would accept me.
T. L.

ANSWER: For goodness sake, stop worrying. All the young lady is waiting for is a proposal. Her actions belie her words to such an extent that they have no other interpretation than extreme interest in you and your welfare.

Miss Nissen cannot reply personally to readers but will answer problems of general interest through this column.
