

GRACE WELDON.

THE TRIAL AND THE JUDGMENT.

And no other besides do you think of? He hesitated about naming Ellery, for he knew that his hostility towards him proceeded from a spirit of rivalry; for James was by no means ignorant that this young gentleman had addressed Grace, and he well knew that the haughty frowns he received from him whenever they met in the street, had their origin in the mortification of a defeat.

You hesitate, said Mr. Weldon, severely, and with a look of suspicion. He hesitated from hardly knowing how to reply. Mr. Carlton Ellery, I have reason to believe, is far from being friendly with me.

Yes, yes, I can understand. I see that it is likely. But it cannot be he, he said to himself. Have you no enemy of the other sex? Not that I am aware of, sir, answered James, with very manifest surprise.

Mr. Weldon remained silent. James's answers seemed to be so rational—so unstudied; and his manner evinced nothing like fear or guilt, but rather surprise and curiosity to know to what this questioning tended.

You were at the bank this morning? said the merchant, fixing his eyes steadily upon his face. Yes, sir. You drew from the bank one thousand dollars? Yes, sir.

Yes, for you placed it in my hands when you returned, and I went out and paid it away. Did you check for any more? For any more? Yes, have you checked for any more? No, sir! I received only that check from you. I was not aware you wished to draw for more. You did not give another check, sir?

No, I did not. But I will give it to you, now. And Mr. Weldon placed the forged check for twenty-five hundred dollars that had been sent in the note to the cashier.

Do you wish me to go to the bank with this, sir? asked James, looking it over and preparing to rise from his chair. But you are aware, sir, that we have but one hundred dollars on deposit of our own.

Mr. Weldon fixed his gaze upon the young man long and searchingly. James answered his penetrating glance by such a look of thorough surprise and inquiry, that Mr. Weldon became almost convinced of his entire innocence, strong as the evidences were against him. But then, thought he, if he has succeeded so thoroughly in dissembling and deceiving me, he may do it now. If he has hid all his depravity under an exterior of integrity, why may he not clothe his features in the apparel of innocence, when he finds he is suspected? I will restrain my impulse to recognize him as innocent until I examine him further.

I know we have no deposits to meet this check, he answered, quietly, but severely; his eyes resting upon the young man's countenance so searchingly that James dropped his own, changed color, and seemed embarrassed as well as surprised. But you know that makes no very material difference. Mr. Morley is very indulgent, you are aware, and will cash it without question. He has done so before, you know.

I was not aware you had over-checked at the bank, answered James, looking at his benefactor with astonishment, as if revolving in his thoughts the conjecture whether he was wholly in his right mind.

Three thousand at one time and a large sum checked for at another, pursued Mr. Weldon, with precisely the manner of one who believed him guilty; and he could hardly divest himself of this impression at moments. Mr. Morley is very indulgent. Nice business operations, this over-checking and re-depositing! Very!

Sir! ejaculated the poor young man, utterly confounded. Do you approve of a merchant's sending to the bank for twenty-five hundred dollars when his bank book should tell him he has but one hundred placed to his credit? No, sir!

Yes, sir, on an emergency. A cashier who knows the checker to be safe would not hesitate to cash for the amount drawn, if it was not large though he would not fail to notify.

But twenty-four hundred dollars is a large sum to over-check for? It is, sir. Yet I will take this check to the bank and present it if you desire it.

Am I in the habit of doing business in this way? No, sir, hence my surprise. Would you think me sane to do business so loosely?

James hesitated how to reply. Mr. Weldon's air, looks, tones, and words had been so unusual, so searching, so mysterious, so significant of some hidden motive, that he questioned if he had really a sane mind there. There was, too, an appearance of suspicion in his manner that he keenly felt. Seeing his response was expected, he answered.

I should think it a very extraordinary departure, sir, from your ordinary way of doing business. Do you think Mr. Morley would cash that check? It is doubtful, sir.

Suppose you address him a note in my name, making it a particular request that he should do so, said the merchant, concentrating his eyes upon his face.

Would it not be better, sir, if you desire this amount, to draw a note and have it discounted. Perhaps, however, you have arranged with the cashier, who has just been with you, for cashing the check.

Oh, no. You had already anticipated me. I, sir. Yes.

In what way? Indeed, Mr. Weldon, there is something in this conversation, and in your manner that gives me exceeding pain and uneasiness, he said, earnestly, and with strong emotion, as if he could no longer restrain his feelings. Will you explain to me what is upon your thoughts concerning me or others?

Suppose you write a note to Mr. Morley, answered the merchant, shutting up his heart and giving himself to the stern duty to which he had nerved his mind; for he resolved there should not be left one doubt in his own mind whether of his guilt or of his innocence. He determined that the one or the other should declare itself.

If you request it, sir. Look at the check. Do you see any thing peculiar or familiar about it? I discover nothing, sir.

No—it is very perfect—very well executed, answered the merchant, sternly; for the accuracy with which the signature was executed, the correctness of the filling up, the little chip, scarcely visible, which was taken out of the edge—a private mark adopted by Mr. Weldon; and even its number, so correctly succeeding the true check for one thousand dollars paid only a quarter of an hour before, all these circumstances forced themselves upon his mind as James was examining it, and strengthened suspicion almost to confirmation that James and no other one was the guilty person.

But this note already written to Mr. Morley will do. You need not trouble yourself to write another. Mr. Weldon, said James, rising, it is really necessary that I should be informed what it is that has produced this extraordinary change in your manner towards me. I seem to be subjected to a sort of inquisitorial judgment without being informed of my offence; for that you are displeased with me—for that you have a suspicion of me—I cannot fail to perceive, as I do with regret and anguish. I do not understand you. I am at a loss to comprehend how I have merited your displeasure, or forfeited your free confidence. If you have anything against me, charge me with it. If I have in my bank operations for you, committed an error, I am ready to repair it, if you will point it out to me. Something has estranged your heart from me, and laid me under suspicion. Will you, sir, throw aside this mystery that envelops whatever is touching me and I shall be most grateful to you.

Mr. Weldon listened with emotion. His eyes filled with tears, and he compressed his mouth and turned away to conceal his feelings. He was thoroughly impressed with his innocence. But he restrained the impulse to open to him frankly the whole matter and assure him of his entire belief in his innocence.

James, I am pained and deeply grieved at the duty I have taken upon myself. You are charged with a crime. A crime! I charged with a crime? What? Who? Nay, I do begin to think you must be innocent. But the evidences are strong against you. Read that letter to Mr. Morley. Is it not your hand-writing? he added, placing his finger upon the address.

It is very much like mine, sir, answered James, taking the letter in his trembling fingers; for the sudden charge of guilt had nearly overpowered him. Yet, sir, it is not mine. I never wrote to Mr. Morley.

Open it and read it! Mr. Weldon watched his face closely for some evidence of guilt. The expression of James's face was that of surprise, horror, indignation. He ended it—glanced again at the date, then at the signature and the seal—and looking up met Mr. Weldon's eyes full upon his own.

The letter enclosed that check upon the table for twenty-five hundred dollars. The check, I need not say, is forged. James took it up and looked bewildered from one to the other. At length with a face as colorless as marble, he said, in a tone singularly calm, his eye fearlessly yet tearfully encountering the searching gaze of his benefactor.

Some enemy hath done this. James—James—I believe it—I know it. I am convinced of your innocence. I have judged you, and you stand acquitted before me. You are the victim of a conspiracy.

As he spoke he rushed forward and throwing himself upon James's shoulder he wept like a child.

CHAPTER XX. THE SUSPICION.

Now, my dear James, said Mr. Weldon, after he had in some degree recovered his composure; now let us investigate this extraordinary affair together. Pardon me, that I have suspected you! but my heart told me you could not be guilty. But—

Sir, do not take the trouble to explain your motives in proceeding with me as you have done. It was the only way to satisfy your own mind, and to give me an opportunity of manifesting my innocence or my guilt. This note is to me a most extraordinary thing. If Mr. Morley placed it in your hands with this forged check, you had every reason to suspect me, sir! I am grateful that, without denial on my part, you have voluntarily acknowledged yourself convinced that I did not utter this check, strong as the circumstances seem! I have indeed an enemy, sir! a cruel and evil enemy, who seeks my downfall!

There is no question of it. Now let us together examine thoroughly into this matter. But first, here is another letter, which I have not shown you. It was written to Mr. Morley. Do you recognize the address? No, sir. It is a female's writing.

Read it. I would not show it to you, for I know its contents will grieve and confound you, but it may lead to the detection of the writer. Read it with calmness, now, my dear friend, for know that I am with you, and that we will defeat your enemies!

It would be difficult to describe James's astonishment as he went over reading the letter signed 'Eveline Dernel.' His cheek flushed and his eyes kindled with honest indignation. It was several moments before he could articulate brokenly.

With this also in your hands, sir, I am surprised at your forbearance with me! Your friendship and confidence, sir, have been sorely tried. I can never be too grateful to you for examining me in private first. If I had been delivered to the police, as it was natural I should have been, I feel I could never have proved my innocence; for I cannot prove who is the guilty person. I have no clue. Did Mr. Morley receive this letter this morning?

Yes, James, not long after the lad had left the bank; for the boy, finding he hesitated about paying the draft, secretly departed; and in a few minutes a black man came in and handed Mr. Morley that letter.

It is very extraordinary! What must Mr. Morley think? Mr. Morley will keep the matter locked in his own bosom until I see him, and report to him the result of my interview with you. Have you no suspicion who the boy is?

None in the least, sir! The whole matter is a mystery to me! And you know no such person as she who signs herself Eveline Dernel?

No, sir. I am lost in amazement. It seems to me that I dream! I imagine I must wake up each instant and realize that it is all a dreadful dream!

I pity you, and sincerely sympathize with you, James. I will take up this affair for you as if I were the victim myself; for you are, without question, the victim of some foul conspiracy against your name and character. I will now tell you all I know touching the operations in the bank, and concerning the lad who was the agent of these frauds. Mr. Weldon then went fully into a detail of all the facts that had been stated to him by Mr. Morley; up to the time he received the note signed 'Dernel.' When he had ended his narrative James sat silently revolving in his mind all persons of his knowledge who would be likely to seek his ruin. He tried to imagine who the female was, but was wholly at fault. He then tried to fasten upon the lad, in his mind, but with no better success. The negro, who was the participator, he could not identify, for he knew none of the race in the city.

Can you fasten upon any body? No, sir. The woman, the lad, the negro, are characters I am wholly at a loss about. There is only one man who would do me an injury, and that is Jack Briggs.

The burglar? Yes, sir; but he is an uneducated person, and it is impossible he should have forged this check, or so successfully have imitated my hand-writing!

THE CHEAPEST AND SAFEST DOCTOR.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.

THIS great household Medicine ranks among the leading cures of many complaints, other remedies cannot reach, this fact is well established as that the sun lights the world.

Disorders of the Liver and Stomach. Most persons will, at some period of their lives, suffer from indigestion, derangement of the liver, stomach or bowels, which not quickly removed, frequently settles into a dangerous illness. It is well known in India, and other tropical climates, that Holloway's Pills are the only remedy that can be relied on in such cases. Almost every soldier abroad carries a box of them in his knapsack. In England most persons know that these Pills will cure them whenever the liver, stomach or bowels are out of order and that they need no physician.

Weakness and Debility. Such as suffer from weakness, or debility, and those who feel want of energy, should at once have recourse to these Pills, as they immediately purify the blood, and acting upon the main-spring of life, give strength and vigor to the system.

To young persons entering into womanhood, with a derangement of the functions, and to mothers at the turn of life, these Pills will be most efficacious in correcting the tide of life that may be on the turn. Young and elderly men suffer in a similar manner at the same periods, when there is always danger if they should therefore undergo a course of this purifying medicine, which ensures lasting health.

Disorders of Children. If these Pills be used according to the printed directions and the Ointment rubbed over the region of the kidneys, at least once a day as salt is forced into meat, it will penetrate the kidneys and correct any derangement of their organs. Should the affliction be stone or gravel, then the Ointment should be rubbed into the neck of the bladder, and a few days will convince the sufferer that the effect of these two remedies is astonishing.

Disorders of the Stomach. To wipe the sources of the deadliest maladies. Their effect is to vitiate all the fluids of the body, and to send a poisoned stream through all the channels of circulation. Now what is the operation of the Pills? They cleanse the bowels, regulate the liver, bring the relaxed or irritated stomach into a natural condition, and acting through the sensitive organs upon the blood itself, change the state of the system from sickness to health, by exercising a simultaneous and wholesome effect upon all its parts and functions.

Complaints of Females. The functional irregularities peculiar to the weaker sex, are invariably corrected without pain or inconvenience by the use of Holloway's Pills. They are the safest and surest medicine for all diseases incidental to females of all ages.

Bilious Affections. All young children should be administered to them, from time to time, a few doses of these Pills, which will purify their blood, and enable them to pass safely through the difficult stages of childhood, such as measles, hooping-cough, cowpox, and other infantile diseases. These Pills are so harmless in their nature as not to injure the most delicate constitution, and are therefore more peculiarly adapted as a corrective of the humors affecting them.

Dropsy. Hundreds are cured yearly by the use of these Pills conjointly with the Ointment, which should be rubbed very liberally into the parts affected.

Derangement of the Kidneys. The quantity and quality of the bile are of vital importance to health. Upon the liver, the gland which secretes the fluid so necessary for digestion, the Pills operate specifically, judiciously rectifying its irregularities, and effectually curing jaundice, bilious remittents, and all the varieties of disease generated by an unnatural condition of that organ.

Holloway's Pills are the best remedy known for the following diseases:—

Table with 4 columns: Ague, Debility, Jaundice, Secondary symptoms. Rows include: Biliousness, Dropsy, Liver Complaints, The Doublenox, Pleurisy, Erysipelas, Tumors, Dropsy, Rheumatism, Venereal Affections, General Swellings, Worms of all kinds, Weakness, from whatever cause, &c., &c.

Sold at the Establishment of PROFESSOR HOLLOWAY, 24 Strand, (near Temple Bar), London, and by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicine throughout the civilized world, at the following prices: 1s. 1ld., 2s. 3d., 4s. 6d., 8s., 12s., and 20s. each Box.

There is a considerable saving by taking the larger size. Directions for the guidance of patients in every case affixed to each Pot.
