THE PIRATE.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

The Captain of whom he last spoke gave sufficient proof of the truth of his words, by uttering an inarticulate growl, and attempting to present a pistol at the mediator Hawkins.

"Why, look ye now!" said Derrick, "there is all the sense he has to get drunk on council day, like one of these poor silly fellows!"

"Ay," said Bunce, "drunk as Davy's sow, in the face of the field, the fray, and the senate!"

"But nevertheless," continued Derrick, "it will never do to have two captains in the same day. I think weak about might suit better—and let Cleveland take the first turn."

"There are as good here as many of them," said Hawkins; "howsoever, I object nothing to Captain Cleveland, and I think he may help us into deep water as well as an other."

"Ay," exclaimed Bunce, "and a better figure he will make at bringing these Kirkwallers to order than his sober predecessors!—So Captain Cleveland for ever!"

"Stop, gentlemen," said Cleveland, who had hitherto been silent; "I hope you will not choose me Captain without my own consent!"

"Ay, by the blue vault of heaven will we," said Bunce, "if it be pro bono publico!"

"But here me, at least," said Cleveland—"I do consent to take command of the vessel, since you wish it, and because I see you will ill get out of the scrape without me."

"Why, then, I say, Cleveland for ever again shouted Bunce.

"Be quiet, prithee, dear Bunce!—honest Almond!" said Cleveland—"I undertake the business on this condition; that when I have got the ship clear for her voyage, with provisions, and so forth, you will be content to restore Captain Goffe to the command, as I said before, and put me, ashore some where to shift for myself—You will then be sure it is impossible I can betray you, since I will remain with you to the last moment."

"Ay, and after the last moment, too, by the blue vault! or I mistake the matter," muttered Bunce to himself.

The matter was now put to the vote; and so confident were the crew in Cleveland's superior address and management, that the temporary deposition of Goffe found little resistance even among his own partisans, who reasonably enough observed, "He might at least have kept sober to look after his own business—E'en let him put it to rights again himself next morning, if he will."

But when the next morning came, the drunken part of the crew, being informed of the issue of the deliberations of the council, to which they were virtually held to have assented, showed such a superior sense of Cleveland's merits, that Goffe, sulky and malcontent as he was, judged it wisest for the present to suppress his feelings of resentment until a safer opportunity for suffering them to explode, and to admit to the degradation which so frequently took place among a piratical crew.

Cleveland, on his part, resolved to take upon him, with spirit and without loss of time, the task of extricating his ship's company from their perilous situation. For this purpose, he ordered the boat, with the purpose of going ashore in person, carrying with him twelve of the stoutest and best men of the ship's company, all very handsomely appointed for the success of their nefarious profession had enabled the pirates to assume nearly as gay dresses as their officers; and above all, each man being sufficiently armed with cutlass and pistols, and several having pole-axes and pioniards.

Cleveland himself was gallantly attired in a blue coat, lined with crimson silk, and laced with gold very richly, crimson damask waistcoat and breeches, a velvet cap, richly embroidered, with a white feather, wish silk stockings, and red-heeled shoes, which were the extremity of finery among the gallants of the day. He had a gold chain several times folded round his neck, which sustained a whistle of the same metal, the ensign of his authority. Above all, he wore a decoration peculiar to those daring depredators, who, besides one, or perhaps two, brace of pistols at their belt, had usually two additional brace, of the finest mounting and workmanship, suspended over their shoulders in a sort of sling or scarf of crimson ribbon. The hilt and mounting of the Captain's sword corresponded in value to the rest of his appointments, and his natural good men was so well adapted to the whole equipment, that, when he appeared on deck, he was received with a general shout by the crew, who, as in other popular societies, judged a great deal by the eye.

Cleveland took with him in the boat, amongst others, his predecessor in office, Goffe, who was also very richly dressed, but who, not having the advantage of such an exterior as Cleveland's, looked like a boorish clown in the dress of a courtier, or rather like a vulgar-faced footpad decked in the spoils of some one whom he has murdered, and whose claim to the property of his garments is rendered doubtful in the eyes of all who look upon him, by the mixture of awkwardness, remorse, cruelty, and insolence, which clouds his countenance. Cleveland probably chose to take Goffe ashore with him, to prevent his having any opportunity, during his absence, to debauch the crew from their allegiance. In this guise they left the ship, and, singing to their oars, while the water foamed higher at the oars, soon reached the quay of Kirkwall.

The command of the vessel was in the meantime entrusted to Bunce, upon whose allegiance Cleveland knew that he might perfectly depend, and, in a private conversation with him of some length, he gave him directions how to act in such emergencies as might occur.

These arrangements being made, and Bunce having been repeatedly charged to stand upon his guard alike against the adherents of Goffe and any attempt from the shore, the boat put off. As she approached the harbor, Cleveland displayed a white flag, and could observe that their appearance seemed to occasion a good deal of bustle and alarm. People were seen running to and fro, and some of them appeared to be getting under arms. The battery was manned hastily, and the English colours displayed. These were alarming symptoms, the rather that Cleveland knew, that, though there were no artillerymen in Kirkwall, yet there were many sailors perfectly competent to the management of great guns, and willing enough to undertake such service in case of need.

Jubilee-Tide in Rome.

(From the correspondence of Mr. Weld to the London Tablet.)

The English deputation to the Holy Father was received in audience on the 10th, and, as far as I can learn, everybody seems to have been pleased with everything that happened.

The Holy Father entered the throne room with customary punctuality. He was accompanied by Mgr. Stoor, (who stood at his right hand during the whole of the audience) and Mgr. Della Volpe, the Maestro di Camera of His Holiness. Hardly had he taken his seat, when he stretched out his arms and exclaimed, with countenance radiant with benignity, "Welcome to the Bishops and faithful of England!"

He continued in words of the greatest kindness and animation, with expressions of interest in the affairs of the Church in England. After a conversation with the Bishop of Clifton on the subject of education for the children of the poor, the Pope alluded once more, with expressions of consolation, to the recent interchange of courtesies between himself and Her Majesty, and referred, with a smile of most kindly recollection, to his having met the Queen in her girlhood during his nunciature at Brussels. His Holiness received first the Duke of Norfolk, after him the Bishop of Clifton, who presented the address of the Catholics of England, then the other Bishops in the order of seniority. As the Bishop of Southwark kissed his hand, somebody said that he was the pastor of the Duke of Norfolk; and the Pope, thereupon, turned playfully towards the Duke and asked the Bishop if that important 'diocesan' behaved himself.

Lord Denbigh was next presented, and after him Lord Petre, in whom the Holy Father seemed fully to recognize the head of a house which is only next in importance to that of Howard in English Catholic annals.

Meanwhile the great body of the deputations were waiting patiently in the galleries without. It was a curious sight to see so many Englishmen wearing evening dress—and not looking very comfortable in it—in the daylight; and hardly less curious, and much more interesting to see the ladies in their ample black veils. I was interested, too, in observing the really astonishing amount of individuality which could find expression in what one would say was such a very simple thing as the putting on of a veil. Certainly a woman's taste, where it exists, is something irresistible, and will show itself in any trifle. Most of the veils were Spanish lace, but I noticed Brussels in one or two cases.

With happy chatter, which perhaps once or twice in the course of the morning may have risen to the dignity of conversation, the hours whiled pleasantly away until it came to each one's turn to be admitted to the throne room.

Immediately on either side of the Holy Father were Mgr. Stoor and the Bishop of Clifton, while about twelve other Bishops were standing round the throne. After the Bishops, the first person to be presented was the aged poetess, Mrs. Mary Howitt, who in a few months will enter upon her ninetieth year. Mrs. Howitt, whose writings were once the delight of so many English and American homes, was converted to Catholicism seven years ago when she was eighty-two. The meeting between this old lady, still erect beneath her burden of years, and the Sovereign Pontiff, bowed beneath burdens of other kinds, was a most touching spectacle. I was not near enough to hear what passed, but when the Holy Father blessed her in farewell, he said gently, "We shall meet in Paradise." The Duke of Norfolk then stepped forward, and offering Mrs. Howitt his arm, led her out of the room. The demeanor of the pilgrims, as they knelt before Pope Leo was of course very various. Some bent in reverent stillness and just listened in silence to the words addressed to them. Others were eager in begging special blessings and favors for themselves, their families and absent friends. One lady was so voluble and emphatic that she gave one the impression that she was giving the Pope some good advice. On the other hand, the Holy Father to some spoke much, and to others little; but a few words to nearly every one.

Lord and Lady Denbigh and Mr. and Mrs. Cary-Elwes and their families came forward in a group, and as they knelt round the throne, Pope Leo at once said: "But which are lo sposo?" Mr. Gervase Cary-Elwes and Lady Winifride Feilding then came forward, and the Holy Father joined their hands together, and after speaking a few words of kindness, gave them each a special benediction, resting his hands on their heads as he spoke. When Lady Ottagan's youngest boy, a pretty child of five years, was led forward, the Pope took him on his knee and caressed him repeatedly, and finally asked him whether he would like to stay. The child looked at the Holy Father a moment and then made what was probably a safe reply: "If mother wishes it."

In the Italian Pilgrimage all ranks and social classes were represented, and among the many interesting episodes related, is that of a peasant woman of Avellino, who knelt before the Pope holding a common corner of paper, such as is used by grocers, which the Holy Father, supposing to contain medals, etc., raised his hand to bless; but the good woman pressed the corner into his hand, saying, in a confidential tone: "Take it, dear Pope (Papa Mio), it is filled with confetti (candies). I brought them purposely for you." The Holy Father smiled, evidently moved, and handing the corner to an ecclesiastic of his Court, said: "See that it be placed in my room; I prize it highly," and added, glancing at a valuable jewel blazing with diamonds, the offering of a lady of rank, immediately preceding the peasant woman, "Probably this gift is more radiant than the diamonds."

Mr. Gervase Cary-Elwes and Lady Winifride Feilding were recently betrothed.
