IN MEMORIAM

MRS. MARGARET McCLOSKEY

The death of Mrs. Margaret McCloskey occurred quite unexpectedly at her home in Emyvale on the evening of September 9, at the advanced age of 82 years.

Mrs. McCloskey although in failing health for several years, was up and around as usual on the day of her death, when she was suddenly stricken and passed away surrounded by several members of her family.

Born at Emyvale the oldest daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. Patrick Wynne she spent her entire life in that place. While still young she married Thomas McCloskey who died suddenly in 1901 leaving her the heavy burden of rearing a family of young children. It is particularly by her family that Mrs. McCloskey will be sorely missed but they will ever cherish fond memories of a loving and devoted mother.

The deceased was a woman of sterling qualities and a devout member of the Roman Catholic Church. She was frequently visited by her pastor when ill health prevented her attending church. Her beloved pastor Reverend Charles McCarthy administered the last sacraments at her death.

She leaves to mourn her loss one daughter Mary, who tenderly cared for her and four sons; William, James T., Vincent and Francis all of Emyvale, also one brother Amrose of Charlottetown and 14 grandchildren. One son, Leo, predeceased her in 1940 and another son Patrick died in infancy.

Her funeral took place from her late residence on Sept. 11, to St. Anne's Church Lot 85, where Requiem High Mass was celebrated by Rev. Charles McCarthy who also conducted service at the grave.

Pallbearers were: James C. McCloskey, James B. Clarkin, Patrick Murray, Patrick McGee, Peter Clarkin and Thomas Carragher. Her remains were tenderly laid to rest in St. Anne's Cemetery to await a glorious resurrection.

May her soul rest in peace.

Strange But True

By F. H. MacArthur

Today's column is condensed and reproduced from the prophecy of Jacques Casotte by Albert Brandt and used by permission of the Clark Publishing Co.

Back in 1788 the Dutchess Beatrice de Grumont threw a dinner party in her beautiful Paris home. The invited guests had been wined and dined lavishly and now sat listening to the music or chatting idly as they chose. Only one guest stood apart, an old man who seemed out of place in that gathering of nobility and intelligentsia. His face was calm and serene. And he was above all other things a religious man — an oddity that frequently occasioned ridicule.

Jacques Casotte was a humble poet whose verses spoke of humanity and of faith in the nobility of the human soul.

"The poet does not approve of our conversations," one of the guests said. And at that precise moment Guillaume de Malesherbes, minister to King Louis XVI, raised his glass and proposed a toast, "Down with religion! Let's drink to the time when reason will be victorious! Unfortunately," he added, shaking his head in mock sympathy, "I shall not live to see that glorious day."

The poet seemed not to hear the other's brief and silly speech. He sat quietly wrapped in serious thought, or like one in a trance. Then he opened his lips; contradicting the king's ministers in a strange voice, a voice which none of the poet's friends had ever heard before.

"You are wrong, de Malesherbes," the poet said. "You — we all — shall live to see that day. It will come in less than 6 years."

The guests looked at Casotte in amazement. Some even laughed loudly. Had the fellow lost his reason?

Not until later did they realize they were witnessing a miracle. For, strange but true, the poet made the only prophecy in history that time proved to be 100 per cent accurate. Casotte's prophecy was written down in one of the guest's diary that same night. This diary is now in existence. Thus the veracity of the prophecy can be checked.

"Well, Casotte," said the Marquis de Condorcet, "Let's hear you unfold future events — prophecy."

Seven of the assembled guests formed a little group about the old poet — Condorcet; the Mayor of Paris; Astronomer Jean Silvan Bailly; the author Jean Antoine Boucher; and Francois de Laharpe, the person who made the notes of the prophecy in his diary.

The poet told de Condorcet, "In a few years you will be a prisoner. Afraid to face the executioner, you will take your own life with poison." (Laughter and applause.)

"And what is to be my fate?" questioned Chamfort.

"You," said the prophet poet will try to commit suicide by slashing your wrists with a razor. This will not bring the desired end and you will live on afterwards as a helpless cripple."

He told the mayor that he would be executed.

Then turning his eyes on the king's minister he said, "And you, sir, will be executed too."

"Your head will roll in the sand," was the end he predicted for author Jean-Boucher.

"But," spoke the mayor, "Who, Casotte, will commit these murders? The Turks?"

"Not so," said the poet. "Your own countrymen will do the job."

This of course, made the whole prophecy seem crazy.

"When will these events take place?" asked Laharpe, a smile spreading over his face.

"Within six years."

"But you, Laharpe will be spared. Give up your atheistic ideas and return to God."

"Oh, la la," Chamfort chortled, "if we all live till Laharpe becomes a Christian, then we are all immortal!"

"What a blessing that I am not a man said the Duchesse, laughing. "We ladies will have nothing to fear."

"Your sex will not save you," said the poet. "You and other ladies of the court will ride in a tumbrel to the place of execution."

"Shall I have the comfort of a father confessor?" queried the Duchesse.

"No," said the prophet. "Only the king will have that mercy."

Having delivered himself of these words the poet apologized for what he had said and started for the door.

"Come back, you old fool! Come back!" called the Condorcet. "You haven't told us what will happen to you."

"I, too, shall die," said the prophet "as an enemy of France, on a sunny day in July, less than 6 years hence."

How do the statements in the diary and the facts of subsequent events tally?

Five years after the Duchesse's party the reign of Terror spread across the land of sunny France. The king was the one of the first to die under the guillotine. He was the only one of the victims to get the last rights of the church.

The Marquis de Condorcet committed suicide by poison while awaiting the day of execution in prison. When placed under arrest Chamfort slashed his wrists with a razor but lived on as a cripple for years. Jean Bailly, de Malesherbes and Jean-Antoine Boucher lost their heads to the guillotine. Jean de Sharpe was spared. He found his faith, entered a monastery and managed to hold on to his precious diary, against which events were checked.

The Duchesse had the honor — if one can call it an honor — of riding in a carriage to her own execution.

Finally, on a sunny day in June, 1794, the aged Jacques Casotte, for his crime of condemning by word and pen the atrocities committed by the Revolutionists was beheaded. His own death completely fulfilled the prophecy. What an amazing story! You take it from here.
