Execution of Riel.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

The London Daily Chronicle says:—
"The Canadian Government have not again taken care that Riel shall never again imperil the welfare of the state, but makes such an example of him that no one else should think of following in his footsteps."

The London, G. B., Times argues that the execution is entirely proper, and concludes:—"We sincerely trust that this view will rapidly commend itself to the common sense of the French-Canadians, and that when the fever of the moment is subsided they will come to regard the execution of Riel not as a brutal assertion of superior force, but as a vindication of law and justice, as much in their interest as in that of the English colonists."

The Ottawa Citizen says: "He had himself to blame, for he had taught the Crown how useless clemency was to those who put an improper construction upon it, and who imagined that, in a constitutionally governed country, there could be a law for one not applicable to another. We cannot hang an Englishman for treason and spare an Irishman for rebellion. We cannot extend pardon to a half-breed for doing that which perpetrated by a Scotchman means death on the scaffold. There must be one law and union or an elastic jointed law with disunion and chaos. Public credit means public order, and under which system this would prevail must be a self-evident proposition. When the law is helpless and torpid, when men violate it with impunity, the authority which permits this disorderly state of affairs is weak, vacillating and unsound, while the nation must, under such a system, degenerate into virtual impotence."

The Quebec Chronicle says: "That Riel deserved his fate not even his strongest admirers will dispute. He is not a martyr to the cause of freedom.
Personally he was not interested in the claims of his people. He became for personal gain a professional liberator and was even willing at a decisive moment in the campaign to sell his sword and betray his friends for a sum of money.
The Government refused to treat with him, hence the precipitancy of the rebellion and its enormous cost in blood and treasure to the people of Canada.
We do not wish to pursue the man who now lies in his grave. He has paid the penalty of his mad act with his life, but we cannot regard him as a political martyr in any sense of the word, nor will history look upon him in that light.
He aroused a good deal of sympathy; but it is sympathy of the maudlin sort, the sympathy that soon passes off, the violent sympathy which strong party feeling fans to a flame, but which finds no place in the throbbing hearts of men. It is a pity, all things considered, that so much effort was made towards saving the prisoner's neck. Every effort was made and foiled when the case went to the British Privy Council. What followed the decision of the laws Lords has not raised Canada in the public estimation. After all, why should Riel, more than any other man, have been allowed to incite rebellion and prompt murder, and go unwhipped of justice?"

What Mrs. Gowanlock says About the Indians.

Her captivity, not unnaturally, failed to impress Mrs. Gowanlock with the nobility with which some writers attribute to the red men. Writing, in her recently published story of her "Two Months in the Camp of Big Bear," of the approach of the day of deliverance, she says:—"Our friends were drawing near—too near to be comfortable for the noble red man, the murderers of defenceless settlers, the despoilers of happy homes, the polluters of poor women and children. They did all that, and yet they are called 'the noble red man.' It may sound musical in the ears of the poet to write of the virtues of that race, but I consider it a perversion of the real facts. During the time I was with them, I could not see anything noble in them, unless it was that they were noble murderers, noble cowards, noble thieves. The facts, I think, also go to show that the Indians are not treated properly. There is no distinction made between the good (there are good Indians) and the bad. The character of the Indian is not studied sufficiently, or only so far as self-interest and selfish motives are concerned. But the majority of the present race can be designated as anything but the 'noble red man.'" She makes a distinction between the Plain and Wood Crees, describing the former as the worst of all the tribes of that name, while of the latter she says that they "were all peaceable and industrious, and were becoming proficient in the art of husbandry." Though Big Bear was nominally chief of the Plain Crees, Wandering Spirit, a bad and vicious man, was, Mrs. Gowanlock says, the actual ruler.

Room for the Children.

Where it is at all practicable it is desirable that each child, as it grows shall have a room to itself, where individual taste may be indulged, where nobody is permitted to meddle with the treasures there collected. Does one like flowers and plants, she should have a sunny window and be encouraged to raise them for her own pleasure. Does another want birds, let his room contain them and let him there attend upon them himself. Does one want nothing but books, give him some shelves and a pretty desk, a dictionary-holder and a waste basket, and let him keep everything to his own mind, within his special sanctum. Is there a boy who wants a work-shop, do your best to improvise one garret or woodshed where he may be absolute master, and cultivate his original tastes with no fear of the housemaid before his eyes.

I think the advantages of these suggestions will make themselves apparent to most minds upon a little consideration, and it is really not so hard a thing to accomplish as many would think, if only some things which are not really essential be put out of mind in considering the question of how to make the best and most beautiful home we can for our families.

I think we all know houses where the best rooms are always kept shut up for the very occasional guests, and where it is not considered of much importance where and how the children are lodged.
A little thought wisely bestowed upon this point would be of advantage to many families.—Chicago Tribune.
