Mrs. W. G. Dickson returned to O'Leary on Wednesday night from a trip to Saint John, N. B.

Little Florence Wedlock, five-year-old daughter of Elmer Wedlock of Unionville has returned from Prince County Hospital in Summerside where she underwent an operation for appendicitis.

Arthur Shelton of O'Leary who has been stationed in Western and Ontario centers with the R. C. A. F. is spending his leave at his home the guest of his mother, Mrs. Nesry Selton. Arthur will be stationed at the Summerside Air Base at the conclusion of his leave.

Mrs. Mae Palmer, primary teacher at O'Leary left on Tuesday Feb. 27th for Littleton New Hampshire where she will visit her sister, Mrs. Hartigan, who is seriously ill and has to undergo an operation on March 1st. She was accompanied as far as Saint John by Mrs. W. G. Dickson. During Mrs. Palmer's absence the teacher at the Primary room will be Mrs. Kenneth Campbell of O'Leary.

The family received a telephone call on March first from Mrs. Mae Palmer of O'Leary who is visiting her sister, Laura, (Mrs. Hartigan) at Littleton, New Hampshire, saying that Mrs. Hartigan had her operation on March first and was resting quite comfortably. Further details would follow by letter. Mrs. Hartigan was formerly Miss Laura Horne of Bloomfield Station and she and her family pay a visit to P. E. I. every summer, the guest of her mother and sisters and brothers. Her many friends wish her successful convalescence.

The Evening Auxiliary of the O'Leary United Church met Thursday night March first at the home of Mrs. Claude MacNeill with the President, Mrs. Gerald Gamble presiding and reading an Easter poem. CRESCENT CARNIVAL

By FRANCES PARKISON KEYES (Continued)

Breck nodded. He was feeling inexplicably happy, but it was hard to make himself heard. Everyone in the room was talking, and the little orchestra was playing. Breck thought he recognized the tune as an aria from Rigoletto. Celeste evidently recognized it, too, for she began to hum it under her breath. Soon half the Italians in the room were humming, and before long several of them had begun to sing. Breck slipped into the chair beside Celeste as soon as he had given their order. Under cover of the music she leaned over and whispered to him. "You love music, just the way I do, don't you?" she asked.

"I don't know. I never thought much about it."

"But if you don't," she persisted, "what made you come back to the garden the other night and listen to my singing?"

He drew a deep breath and moved nearer to her. Against the edge of the chair he could feel the warmth of her presence close to his own.

"What made you go on singing?" he asked. "After you knew I was there?"

Anna's "program" called for departure from New Orleans on a Thursday at quarter before ten in the morning. This would enable her to see that everything was in order at the Prytania Street house before she left it, and still get to Splendida in time for dinner.

Never had she seen a dwelling place at one and the same time so majestic, yet so luminous. She gazed at it in unstinted admiration mingled with reluctant awe.

"I told you there wasn't another place like it in the world, Anna," Breck was saying. "Perhaps now you'll believe me."

She did not try to dispute him. He helped her out of the car, and they stood together looking silently up at the superb structure which towered before them in such grandeur. Splendida: if ever a place deserved its name, this one did. Anna said to herself, and realized that she was saying it ungrudgingly, that she was gratified to the core of her being because she was the mistress and co-owner of such a domain. As she put her foot on the first of the long flight of marble steps leading up to the doorway, she knew that this movement was symbolic, that she never would rest until she had surmounted not only the steps, but everything that was there.

CHAPTER XI.

Breck was sleeping worse and worse, dreaming more and more. The deep quiet of the country, broken only by the small stirrings and chirpings of friendly little creatures, failed to soothe him during the first night he spent at Splendida. At last he took a strong sedative and subsided into a stupor which had no relation to normal drowsiness, though he found some relief in the realization of approaching unconsciousness. When he heard the clanging of a distant bell, he thought it was only part of another troubled dream. But when commotion began in the corridor directly beyond his room and his door flew open, bringing this commotion straight to his bedside, he knew that he was confronted with some unwelcome reality. Rousing himself reluctantly, he opened his eyes and sat up just in time to see Master Drew standing before him, bellowing with rage and indignantly pursued by Nana, hurled himself against his father.

"Let go of me, you old fuss!" he shouted in the direction of his nurse. "Daddy, we promised Mr. Yates that we would go out on the plantation when the bell rang. And now Nana won't let me go."

"It's only six o'clock, Mr. Breckenridge. You know that Mrs. Breckenridge has always made a point of having Master Drew stay in bed until seven-thirty. Master Drew is most disobedient, if you'll permit me to say so. His conduct isn't at all becoming a little gentleman."

"It's probably my fault, Nana. I did promise Drew that he could go out with me. I ought to have told you so last night. And I ought to have been up early enough myself to see that he was ready on time. Go back to the nursery with Nana, Drew, and get dressed. I'll meet you at the front door in ten minutes. Perhaps you'd better get dressed here. Go ahead, Nana, bring his clothes."

Still bristling with un concealed indignation, the Englishwoman turned toward the door leading to the corridor and walked stiffly through it, closing it after her with precision. If Breck had only had the sense to sleep at the other end of the house, Drew would have come to him there, and Anna would not have heard all this uproar. She would not now be standing accusingly on his threshold.

"Drew, what do you mean by coming to your father's room at this hour? Go back to Nana at once. Breck, I cannot understand why you countenance all this commotion!"

"I made a promise, Anna, and forgot it. I've told Drew I'd take

Mr. Heath Chisholm was in charge of funeral arrangements.

A large number of the hockey fans travelled to Summerside to see the hockey game between Borden Nationals versus Summerside Crystals, playing the second game of the season at the Bedeque Rink. The Albany St. Pats put up a game fight but could not stave off the Freetown team in the third period. Freetown won the East Prince Intermediate 'B' championship, the score being twelve to eight for the round score of both games.

him out when the plantation bell rang. I'm going to do it—this morning and every morning. I'm very sorry you were disturbed. I'm sure Drew is, too, and that he'll tell you so. I'll sleep downstairs after this, in the rear wing. Drew can have the other downstairs chamber. If you don't approve of that arrangement, Drew and I can bunk together. He's getting pretty big to be tied to a nurse's arion strings."
