Nowlan, Auditor-General Have Sharp Disagreement

OTTAWA (CP) — Former revenue minister Nowlan and Auditor-General Maxwell Henderson have disagreed sharply on the type of income tax files which should be made available to the auditor - general as watchdog of the federal treasury.

This conflict was one of three developments at a Commons public accounts committee meeting in the case of three income tax files that Mr. Nowlan kept from the auditor-general.

Mr. Nowlan, now finance minister, said the auditor - general should have access to files relating to attempts by the department to collect back taxes. However, he said Mr. Henderson should be denied access to a taxpayer's personal file dealing with his financial situation.

But Mr. Henderson said he required access to both types of files to do "a proper job." He said that prior to the case of the three income tax files there had been no similar refusal since 1947.

DON'T KNOW

Mr. Nowlan said that at the [illegible] Mr. Henderson access to the files he was under the impression that It was the practice of the revenue department not to release such documents.

"I did not know that such files were ever released," he said.

However, he now realized that it was practice to make available to the auditor - general files relating to collections. He agreed that in the case of the three files under discussion the collection files should be given to Mr. Henderson, but not the personal files.

Mr. Henderson told the committee earlier that the three cases came to his audit staff's notice because the cabinet's treasury board had approved withholding of government payments due to the three persons as a means of collecting taxes owing. Last January his auditors had asked to see the collection files in the revenue department head office here.

Deputy revenue minister Gear McEntyre said Mr. Henderson has been refused the files partly because they contained "personal and confidential" correspondence between the taxpayers and Mr. Nowlan.

Mr. McEntyre was asked, in view of Mr. Nowlan's statement, whether the collection files would be made available to Mr. Henderson. He replied that he would have to consult Revenue Minister Hugh John Flemming.

Last week Mr. Nowlan said that some of the files involved members of Parliament.

He said Friday some newspapers had attempted to portray that MPs get special treatment when it comes to collecting taxes they owe.

"No MPs are protected," Mr. Nowlan said.

Nfld. Shoe Firm Given Contract
