Councillor Explains Reasons For Revising Electric Charges

Councillor Hillard Clark, chairman of the electric light committee, last evening presented a detailed explanation of the reasons for revision of some commercial service charges on electric power, which, he said, had not meant any increase in basic rates, but rather a reclassification of some commercial establishments which for years had been incorrectly classified as to service rates.

Councillor Clark made his report last evening to the regular meeting of the Summerside Town Council.

Council approved a resolution providing a grant of $600 to help finance the 1957 Lobster Carnival. The grant was made, Councillor Clark said, by a unanimous decision of the council, because the town had not made any direct contribution to the carnival committee in regard to finances, and had billed the carnival committee for more than $1,200 for electricity in accordance with usual rates and charges

Council also approved an expenditure of approximately $600 for street name plates, which Councillor Leo Wood said would provide the 121 signs which supply all the street signs presently needed to complete the identification of Summerside streets.

Councillor Clark took issue with a statement in the police report read by Councillor W.E. Jenkins, in which it was reported that the speed watch was used on an average of twice a week checking traffic, and that very few speeders have been caught, thus indicating that there was less speeding than previously.

Councillor Clark said he felt there is still plenty of room for catching speeders in Summerside. He said the police report seemed odd when so much is heard about speeding in the town, and so few appear to be caught, and he believed that police action on the matter was unsatisfactory.

Councillor Jenkins suggested that citizens might help police in the matter by reporting from areas where speeding is prevalent.
