

B.C. Left Uncertain Of Thinking, Drinking

By LESLIE MILLIN
VANCOUVER (CP)—A long, hot summer of labor strife has left the average British Columbian uncertain of his thinking, his drinking or his dying.

The heat seemed to keep the trade union movement simmering at the same time as it gave fans to many who didn't really want them—placard carriers on picket lines and strike-aided workers killing time on beaches.

By Labor Day weekend, strikes had held up shipping, trucking, trains and mail. They had spread their influence deep into the Prairies and south to Washington state.

And they had left many a man without a beer or a coffin to call his own.

It was probably the costliest summer in the province's labor history.

GRAIN STRIKE BIGGEST
Biggest and costliest was the federally-handled strike of Vancouver grain workers, a 72-day strangulation of wheat flow eventually settled on what amounted to federal government orders.

But months before the grain handlers left the job, the public watched as unions flexed their muscles.

In April, Vancouver's two major cemeteries were struck by their grave diggers and outside workers, who picketed the burial grounds every day but Sunday.

Burial services went on as usual, but the bodies were stored in mortuaries until the members of the Construction and General Laborers Union (CLC) returned to work after several weeks.

DISPUTES LISTED
As the summer grew hotter, the public watched:

1. Teamsters stay off the job for four days in a strike that could in time have paralyzed the province;
2. Postal workers rise in wrath against what they considered poor wages;
3. Bartenders picketing Okan-

gas cocktail lounges for higher pay;

4. Coffin-makers striking at Vancouver Casket Co. Ltd.;

5. A threatened strike by the International Typographical Union at Pacific Press, which prints Vancouver's two daily newspapers;

6. And a strike by brewery workers—who belong to the same union as grain handlers—which is still in progress, and has put nearly 3,000 beer parlor waiters and lapmen out of work because beer parlors can obtain no beer.

next federal elections, was announced here.

A pamphlet handed to reporters at a press conference said the party does not propose separation of Quebec from the rest of Canada, but insists upon respect for the principle of equality between the two nations, by means of a new constitution.

A six-page manifesto, read by a party spokesman, set out the following aims if the party is elected in Ottawa.

1. Severance of all sovereign ties Canada has with other countries;
2. Formation of a new parliamentary system under a president and two chambers, one representing English Canada and the second French Canada;
3. Rewriting of the constitution to give French-Canadians "justice and representation;"
4. Abolition of political ties which are "resulting in the steady deterioration of the country."

The holdup play occurs in many forms. The mere opportunity to take a trick at a given point certainly does not create an obligation to do so. On the contrary, both the declarer and the defenders are frequently better off to refuse a trick which can be won.

In most cases the holdup play is used by the declarer and occurs in conjunction with no-
