ELLEN'S DIARY

Talks Of Retiring But Still Does Day's Work

"I wonder, Ellen," James commented at breakfast with a twinkle, "how we'll do at the farming?"

Sometimes at Alderlea when the work and the cares of it press too insistently, he has visions of retiring to a "nice little place of our own with a cow and a horse and just enough to do, to keep us both in good trim."

Today even with much and good assistance our farming was to be tested today when the younger farmer severed briefly the home-ties and with a pair of other farmers was off on an outing to the Mainland.

In all fairness to James, indeed in admiration of his interest and energy and industry, he still does a fine day's work at the farming. Yet naturally it is the younger farmer who assumes the heavier end of it, though James is at his side to share in the burden and care. In a helpful start to today the younger man had fed the stock and tumbled a supply of hay from the mows for the later feedings of the day.

The morning was sunny and fair. The crossing would be pleasant for the travellers it came to mind as we went about our indoor cares. The children went to school. And now Jeanie and Alex (the baby) were out doors she to assist James at his chores.

presently Jamie appeared, a young man of a fellow, industrious and well versed in the ways of the land to handle the tractor and spreader and attend to the cleaning of stables before returning to his home and its affairs.

"Well, we got along very well with the work this morning", James reported with a relieved sign in the calm of high noon. That was the exact time, the piggery called him at a thought, and our fortunes commenced to increase there in a number. And also our concerns.

"You run in with these, Ellen," he whispered, hands busy later when we came to look in on the scene, gathering in a relay, half the number to a basket to have the "black" teeth extracted in the quiet of the old kitchen. At length, with all returned to nurse and nap against a good mother's bosom we decided "we may as well take a bit of a rest now" in this farming of ours.

But first a drink of water. We opened a shining faucet in the kitchen. What, no flow! The power? A clock was measuring off the afternoon's hours. It was the pump.

"Well" we observed at a house-wifely thought over the supper ahead "the kettle's full." That would be like having a drop out of the Strath" he offered, "What about the cattle and all?"

Rob was summoned, and Jamie, A. mechanic came and his helper. Soon cows lowed, horses neighed, sows turned away thirsty from dry thoughts.

Folks dropped by: one would buy a cow, one wished to know "how that new manure spreader works?" one wondered if they would part with a registered heifer's heifer - calf; a salesman came. And another pair of "feeders" on his truck he would sell, until James and his staff including Mack now, were being included in the heat of the "many-things", demanded of their day.

Now the pump, inwards exposed, awaits the morning and "extras" from town. The day wears calmly away.

And "What now of our farming?" we chuckled to James in the old armchair where he listens against the night for a sound of the return of the absent one.

A good day with it has been—one which gives us to go presently weary, but well to our rest.

Until tomorrow — — — Diary, Good-night.
